The State's Next Great Problem is Taxation

(From the Chapel Hill Weekly)
It becomes more apparent every day that the next great problem for North Carolina to solve is taxation.

Here is a political question, in the sense that the final decision must be made by the political leaders; but it is one in which every household in the state has a deep concern and which, therefore, will inspire a livelier and steadier attention than the people bestow upon other questions that the legislature is called upon to settle.

There is much talk of the state's need for a longer school term, and the better training of teachers; for the improvement of the accommodations in hospitals, asylums, and prisons; for the continued expansion of the University and other public institutions; for this, that, and another improvement or reform. But in the background, always, looms the spectre of taxation. The voice of the commonwealth arises in the plaintive query: "But where is the money coming from?"

That the enlightened element in North Carolina is swinging into line for larger, much larger, expenditures for public education, cannot be doubted. Recently we commented upon the statement of E. B. Jeffress, mayor of Greensboro, that North Carolina must set about readjusting its system of taxation in order to provide adequate funds. And now we cite three utterances, published within the last week, bearing in the same direction.

"The wonderful progress of the state is on every tongue," says Charity and Children, "and we are thankful that old North Carolina has forged to the front, but there is a deep feeling of unrest on account of the unequal distribution of our taxes. The wealth of the state is not bearing its just proportion of the burden. People of slender means and especially land owners, are lifting more than their share of the load. So far the victims of this injustice have only grumbled, but as Mr. Jeffress says, they will not stand it forever. The next fight, he predicts, will be over the subject of taxation and it will be a fight for fair. Our citizens are patient and long suffering but when their patience is exhausted they can fight like fury. We do not know what means will be employed to right this great wrong, but some means will be found. The progress of the state will not be halted; having put our hands to the plow we will not look back; but our system of taxation must be put on a just basis. A large element of our people are under crushing burdens, and these people must find relief. Mr. Jeffress has struck the highest note that has been sounded so far and it will ring throughout North Carolina. Our taxes must bear more equally on all our people.

In a speech in Salisbury on "The Dollar versus the Child," A. T. Allen, state superintendent of public instruction, advocated the lengthening of the legal term to eight months. "The demand for the eight-months term," he said, "is not based on sentimental grounds, but upon what I believe to be sound educational and economic reasons."

Alluding to the men who led the campaign for education a quarter of a century ago, R. R. Clark, in the Greensboro News of last Friday, said:

"These evangels of educational opportunity literally wrung from political leadership, generally speaking, the educational advances we have made. . . . The demand was created, and the people, not the political leadership made the advance. That is in evidence today. The politicians, generally speaking, are dodging the issue of tax adjustment that will give the children in the weaker counties the same educational advantages as the wealthy counties are able to provide for their own. . . . The inequality will be remedied when the people are aroused to the injustice of the situation. . . .

"If we build safely, if our foundation is to endure, then the moral, spiritual, and intellectual progress must keep pace with the material. . . . The children in the weaker counties must have the same educational opportunities as the stronger counties are able to give their children. . . . Some of the politicians are denouncing any criticism of our educational progress and boasting that we have made a wonderful advance. We have made progress, comparatively. But these people who insist that criticism is unjust know that the conditions are unjust—that the burdens are unequal and the opportunities unequal. But they lack the courage to meet the issue and propose a remedy. They will come in when they are driven."

The agitation for a readjustment of the taxation system is now in an early stage. Today we are hearing the premonitory rumblings of a storm that is sure to break.

The danger is that the state, faced with an irresistible demand for more liberal appropriations, will adopt some ill-constructed, patchwork plan for raising the necessary revenue. Perhaps at this coming session, since the time is short, tax measures of an emergency character will be forced upon the legislature. But before North Carolina commits itself to a definite taxation policy, should it not have the most expert advice that the nation is able to afford? Taxation is a stupendously difficult problem. There are men (we think of Mr. Seligman of New York, and there are others of like renown) who have devoted their lives to studying it. We should like to see North Carolina employ some of the country's leading taxation experts to come into the state, make a thorough survey of our politico-economic structure, and present their recommendations for a well-rounded revenue-raising revenue system. Even though the experts had their different theories, and offered conflicting solutions, this would do no harm. They would perform an invaluable service in giving information about politics that had been tried out in other states and in foreign lands, in placing before the people concrete proposals to discuss. There is nothing most people know less about, and nothing they need to know more about, than taxation. Such an inquiry as is here suggested, we believe, would lead the way to at least a reasonably intelligent solution.

"A small leak will sink a

"Gasolines 'most all look alike and smell alike, but when it comes to performance they sure do vary—often times enough for you to find the difference between a good motor and a dud, right in the gasoline. Believe me, I don't take chances with my motor. I stop any leaks of power, smoothness, flexibility and what-not right at the start. I always use 'Standard' Gasoline—and my motor is always in ship-shape trim."

"There's a whole lot of satisfaction in using 'Standard'. A great feeling of confidence that comes from knowing it's the result of fifty-six years' refining experience—that it is always dependable. Then, too, it's easy to get. Wherever you go you'll find a 'Standard' Gasoline pump right handy."
