THAT YOUTHFUL, ROMANTIC HANGOVER

Dear Miss Flo—
 Before I married my husband I was in love with a much younger and much more attractive man. We were engaged, but we quarreled and we drifted apart. He never married.
 I have been married fifteen years but somehow I can't seem to forget the first man. I unconsciously keep comparing him to my husband and my husband suffers by the comparison. Recently I received a letter from him asking if I might see me again to talk over old times. I was very glad to hear from him, but when I told my husband about it he was very much upset. Don't you think he is unreasonable?

Mary Louise.
 How would you like your husband to open up a friendship with one of his old sweethearts—one to whom in his mind you suffered in comparison?
 Perhaps he feels intuitively that you haven't been able to entirely forget your first love affair, and that it might result disastrously and might break up his home. Prospects of that sort would rather upset him—especially if he happens to love you.
 Personally, I believe the danger of such mishap is slight. I think you are suffering from a youthful, romantic hang-over—and in your comparison you are picturing your former sweetheart as a perfect being with none of the faults possessed by the man you married, and naturally you imagine yourself perfectly happy had you married your first love.

Part of the trouble is that while you are well aware of the shortcomings of the man you did marry—you aren't aware of those of the man you didn't marry. Fifteen years cast a glow of illusion over your early romance.

Cheer up, Mary Louise, you are not suffering from a broken heart, you are suffering from romantic imagination. There isn't any man without nerves and temper and irritating ways nor who is always thoughtful and unselfish and considerate.

The best cure possible, in my opinion, would be for you to see the once beloved one. No cure could be so effectual—or so disillusioning—than to see the Prince Charming of your dreams—the man for whom you have been pining and grieving. What! Can this be the wonderful youth I have been regretting for fifteen years. Can this unromantic fat man whose only topics of conversation is business, and who is fussy about his food and can't sit in drafts,—can this be the man to whom I have been unfavorably comparing my own good husband all these years? Ridiculous, you say, and your cure will be complete.

You'll thank your lucky stars he is the man you didn't marry, and you'll be glad to make the best of your husband.
