WELL DRILLING IN LEE AND CHATHAM

A Bunch of Yarns Which Illustrates That Well Digging Has Its Brighter Moments.

The following from the Aberdeen Pilot will do to pass along:

Curtis Dowdy, of Dowdy and Butler, the well drillers, is something of an observer and historian. He tells a yarn of a man up in Lee county who is getting a well by the old method of a darkey and a pick and shovel. Or rather the man water has not proved a success not productive." Then came a darkey who knew how to work the the location of water under ground. He spied out the location, and it was the only one in the neighborhood. He told Dowdy that if he had limb would never work. He suggested that Dowdy slip some silver in the hip pocket of the peach over the ground and the branch turned down ... at every place. He remarked that when he had silver in his pocket that the peach limb would always turn down and indicate water whether water was there or not. Then he reached in his pocket possibly to return Dowdy the coin. He found none. Neither of them referred to it, of the wrong guess of the divining rod. However the man went on digging at the one spot he said he had found water. So far he has not fount it yet.

However, he has at least three wells in that location if he has no water. He could get rich if he could saw his wells into short lengths and sell them for post holes. Dowdy tells of another man who had to fence his pasture in little lots. So many gold mines had been sunk around up there a cow was likely to fall into them anywhere.

Which calls up the story of the woman up near Jugtown who has bene carrying water for thirty years. She got sick, and her husband, carried water for about a Then he said he could not week. stand that and he dug a well. When his wife was revived in health she was mighty pleased, but she had been saving water so long she always poured back in the well any little that remained in the bucket. She could not wast it.

In the dry spell up in Chatham county the water supply fell low, and two or three barrels were secured to haul water from a distant well. When the first barrell was broached for a supply for the table the woman of the house protested at its curious taste. "Funny" said the man. "Thought I had washed out that barrel Jud was mixin' mash in."
