For the fourth time in the past two years, four top Hollywood names have gotten together to turn out another important Hollywood production, "One Night in Lisbon," which opens Thursday at the Liberty Theatre. They are the box office term, Madeleine Carroll and Fred MacMurray, producer-director Edward H. Griffith and Virginia Van Upp, famous screen writer. Their first effort was "Cafe Society." After that came "Honey-moon in Bali" and recently "Virginia." Now the foursome have turned out their most ambitious effort, "One Night in Lisbon" for Paramount, which promises to top everything they have done in the past.

Griffith, who believes in realism of sets and scenic effects, had taken his entire troupe to Virginia to shoot the film of that name that was acclaimed for its color and authenticity as well as its story. This time, however, the locale was a real problem—Lisbon.

Griffith arranged with Paramount's London office to supply necessary material for his timely film. This included air raid shelter pictures and diagrams; black-out rules and regulations; methods of handling fires; actual uniforms; posters and signs of all kinds; "all clear" signals and other details necessary to give the audience an authentic feeling of the movie's backgrounds. The first half of the film takes place in war-torn London; the story then moves to Lisbon—Europe's last free city of wine, women and song.

Paramount photographers and sound men managed to film and record actual London air-raids, screaming sirens and exploding bombs, and fire fighting. Actor-playing fire warden in the film got some unexpected experience when one of the prop buildings in the studio actually caught fire. Several of them, volunteer firemen in private life, put out the blaze in record time.

The majority of the all star cast were born under the British flag which may in part, account for their inspiring performances. Top names include Madeleine Carroll, born in England, where she started her stage and screen career; Patricia Morison, though not born in England, was taken there by her English parents to live as a child; John Loder, English born and bred, who held the distinction of being the youngest commissioned lieutenant in the British Army during the last World War; Reginald Denny, who did his bit for his native country when he served in the Royal Flying Corps back in 1917; and Dame May Whitty, Hollywood's only English titled actress.
