While Mr. Greeley would estimate her debt to be larger than that of any oth er people, a political comomist would perceive that, of all nations, she is the least in debt.

To say that "nothing so stiffens a nation's credit as an obvious resolve to get speedily out of debt," is to assert that nothing so invites a ereditor to lend money at low rates of interest as the assurance that he will soon have to change of the nation as to satisfy them that, if they depurpose. It is to assert that nothing so strengthens a nation as to put an end to all financial interests which its own people, or those of other nations, may have depending on its duration and prosperity. It is to assert that, when the people are denied the privilege of lending their irplus means to the nation, and so, as the next best means of investing them, they lend them to the various States, this does not give the lenders a stronger inherent in State sovereignty than in national sovereignty—in secession than in Un-ion.
