I sat at his feet, and is accepts sweet, The told me of Auld Long Syne; Of his youth's gird day, when young and gay, He sung full many a chime.

The bake in its mother's arms at play, Would start at the silver sound, But the bulic's sweet hreath, was stop'd by death And the bell toiled the news around!

Next he sung a peal for a Statesman bold, He rung till the welkin rung. And the voices load, of the eager crowd, Were hushed by the god-like mun.

For a May day gay, he rung next day. For the Queen and her maidens fair.

With their laughing eyes and anowy robes— No sound of sorrow was there.

And then for a achool's last closing day. For the friends to assemble round, With throbbing heart, and with changing cheek, They passed at the startling sound.

For a noble youth, the next peal rung, And his muiden speech he gave, And the list ning crowd on his accents bung Till they cheered the young and brave.

The bell rung the bridal song; But few were the days that passed away, When the bride to the grave was horne.

And often at midnight's witching hour, When mortals in slumber are bound, For Fire be rings t and the flames roll on, O list to the awful would!

The old man ceased my heart it beat, A bush on the sir had crept, And the clock struck one with its iron tor And I found that I still had slept.

Tull on, toll on, old Bell tell on ; The' few will the lesson heed, That of those who first thy said notes heard,

For me, that bell has telled for me, Not once, but twice, thrice o'er; And I then did deem, in my grief's wild dream That joy was forever o'er

Yet stiff old Bell, I love thee well, And long may thy tonce ring on, Tho' still to me that voice will be A mem'ry of joys long gone.

No stay, time will still baste on, For the hours flit by, and the seasons roll, And beauty and youth are gong.
