Sunday in Paris.

In Paris I was awakened on Sabbath morning by a roar and and rush on the street below. Looking from my window I saw long strings of carts loaded with debris from a building which workmen were busily demolishing. Going on the street I found it crowded with vehicles and a multitude of people, some hurrying to their places of business, others going forth to make the day's purchases, while others in gay attire are hastening to the railway station for a day's pleasure in the suburbs of the city. Later on, when I again went forth, the places of trade were open and business going on with its accustomed regularity. Restaurants and cafes were thronged with people eating and drinking, while the churches were the most neglected-looking institutions in all the city. Only a few worshipers were seen to enter, though grieved me most was to see the work. men of Paris toiling at their tasks the livelong day.
