

Teachers Described by Study

RALEIGH--The typical Tar Heel Teacher has 11 years experience and works seven and a half hours a day at school without a lunch break, research by the North Carolina Association of Educators shows.

Lloyd S. Isaacs, executive secretary of the North Carolina Association of Educators (NCAE) said the study illustrates some of the very real hazards of teaching: "No one ought to have to spend that long with children without a lunch break," he said.

The typical teacher spends between four and 12 hours a week working on school tasks outside of the required school day, the study shows. The typical teacher holds a bachelor's degree and has been back to college for more study since graduation. The extra study has been on the teacher's own personal time and money.

A profile of the typical teacher was drawn by a scientific random-sample survey of all teachers in North Carolina. NCAE's research staff made the survey.

The survey found the average age of teachers to be 37 and the median age to be 34. More than half of all teachers--62 per cent--are under age 40. The average teacher has 11 years of experience and has been in the current school system for eight years.

More than 83 per cent of all teachers are teaching in their major fields. More than 90 per cent of North Carolina's teachers expect to continue teaching in their current positions next year.

"Obviously this data indicates that North Carolina is blessed with a teaching force of career professionals," Isaacs concluded.

"It can no longer be said that teachers fare just young women marking time while they catch a husband. Neither can it be said that teachers are wives working for pin money or just to get out of the house," he added.

"Teachers spend long hours after school working on school work. Teachers are every bit as professional as the physician who doesn't quit until the last patient is seen. Teachers work right through lunch when they take the children to the cafeteria. Almost every other occupation at least provides a duty-free lunch," he said.

The survey shows that 58.5 per cent of all teachers supervise children during their lunch periods. Almost half--43 per cent--have no free time during the school day to prepare future lesson plans, which means that has to be done after hours.

The walking catfish can live out of water for days and even "walks" on land from one lake to another, according to The World Book Encyclopedia. In addition to gills, the fish has lunglike breathing organs. It uses its front fins and tail to crawl along the ground.
