

Here's A Check List For 'Trouble-Shooting' Your Plants' Symptoms

House plants have ways of telling you something isn't right, and a couple of these are yellowing of leaves and dropping leaves. Here's a check list for "trouble-shooting" plants showing symptoms:

- Improper light. This can be either too much or too little light, but most likely in the case of house plants it's a matter of insufficient natural light.

- Shock of transplanting. Moving the plant from one container to another may have been poorly done. Possibly the soil wasn't firmed around roots, or were a lot of the hair-like roots lost in the process?
- Sudden changes in temperature or light.
- Over-fertilizing or, less frequently, using too little fertilizer.

- Drafty location.
- Gas fumes.
- Insects and diseases.

You can usually see the insect, but the diseases may be difficult to distinguish.

- Packed soil due to infrequent repotting and improper watering.

- Improper moisture.

Over-watering is a common problem.

Extension horticulturists at North Carolina State University suggest that yellowing or dropping of leaves from house plants, or both could be the result of one or a combination of the above.
