

Keynote speaker at the annual Mass Media Careers Day Conference at A&T State University was Robert Maynard, standing. Maynard, who operates the Oakland (Calif.) Tribune, is the first black publisher of a major daily paper in the United States.

Participants in the recent Mass Media Careers Day Conference at A&T State University were, left to right, Luther Brown, field producer for NBC; Luther Jackson, professor of journalism at Columbia University; Robert Maynard, publisher of the daily Oakland Tribune; and Luix Overbea, reporter for the Christian Science Monitor.

I did them myself. When you are supposed to be at the ballgame, you are down the street smoking a joint," she said. "The little things started adding up to bigger things. First it was a joint, then a syringe, then a gun. It's too late for us. We blew it. Don't be like us."

The interaction between the inmates and the girls continued for another 15 minutes. Then the groups broke up into one-on-one conversations between one inmate and one of the young girls. The conversations were personal and could not be reported, but the tone and attitude of the girls when they left the inmate was that "In some ways that inmate is very much like me, and if it could happen to her, it could happen to me."

In short, the goals of the program had been accomplished.

The Program's Purpose

Unlike some of the earlier prison visitation programs for teenage offenders, the local program does not include scare tactics. It's only intended to be an educational program, Martin said.

"The program is intended to broaden their awareness," he said. "Most of them (parolees) feel that the prison conditions were worse than what they thought. Some look at it (prison) more like a hotel. When they get there, most are surprised that the conditions look bad, but that the inmates are not drooling with big scares. They look like normal people."

"The aim is to get them to realize that 'I don't want to be there, but I could see how I could be there,'" he said.

Martin said that some of the earlier programs where scare tactics were used were found not to be as effective and sometimes had adverse psychological effects.

"I'm not interested in scaring the kids into making a decision. I'm into education," Martin said. "Part of the program is about giving the kids choices. It's closer to reality ... and it comes across as more genuine."

In addition to the program being available to girls, there is a similar men's program and both are available to potential troublemakers as well as being a requirement for those on parole.

His father, who is a brick mason and built the fireplace that was the subject of Eric's first drawing at the age of six, abruptly interrupts and assures him.

"Oh, there'll be enough money," Prunty says. "There'll be enough money all right, as long as you keep up your interest in school."
