Close-Up

the opportunity to watch them bloom during the brief period.

Seventeen-year-old Donna Terry's mother says she considers her daughter's involvement with the debutantes as valuable.

"It's been a very rewarding experience for Donna, as far as mixing with other people is concerned," says Betty Terry. "It's really good for her because it's providing her with the opportunity to be exposed."

A shy Jamestris Gaddy, 16, stands off in the doorway watching all the chatter among her fellow deb. Posture perfect in her mint-green dress, the aspiring model, who wants to study anatomy at Howard University, blushes when approached.

"I'm enjoying being a deb," she says. "This whole thing is teaching me how to deal with other people and their attitudes. It's really helped me learn to be more open."

If Mona Lisa Coleman, 16, ever had to make an impression, she succeeded at the social hour. As she entered the room with her mother, both dressed in smart black suits, eyes focused on Mona's stylish black hat and the oohs and ahs followed.

Kimberly Lentz, an 18-year-old freshman at Winston-Salem State University, is probably one of the most outgoing of all the 12 deb. The others are naturally drawn to her and the conversation is of clothes, jewelry and college life.

"I was really nervous about being a deb at first," Lentz says. "I thought all the people were going to be snooty and, you know, cute. "It's not like that, though. I'm really enjoying this."
