formed their fact-finding committee to study the MOVE incident, Walters said.

The major reason for the organization's inception, said Walters, was the lack of feedback from the black leadership on the incident.

"This was a gross violation of human and civil rights of black people, yet there was a lack of response by black leaders," said Walters.

In addition to the resignation of Goode, the group has called for the resignation of the Philadelphia police chief and any other city officials connected with the MOVE crisis.

Walters also called a review of the MOVE bombings by a city-sanctioned group "faulty and unfair." That review concluded that the city had acted responsibly in the handling of the matter.

Nowhere else but in the black community would city leaders let a conflict between a community and a small group of residents simmer for 18 months, said Walters.

Walters said community residents had complained to the city about MOVE's members and asked for help in resolving the situation.

Residents had told city officials that the MOVE members' house was filthy and rat-infested and that they constantly played loud, taped religious messages. But no attempt was made by the city to bring the two groups together to work out a compromise, said Walters.

The Philadelphia police actions represent the "most violent eviction to take place," said Conyers.
