annual convention of the National Newspaper Publishers Association at Winston-Salem, which appeared in our Atlanta Daily World, I am excited to learn what the NNPA is all about.

I am confident that your well-organized and well-planned programs and workshops will definitely strengthen the ties between all black publishers and bring them closer together, because togetherness means strength. With this strength, the power of the black press will become a vital and effective reality.

In addition, the NNPA scholarship program is timely, and demonstrates the acceptance of our responsibility to our youth and students, who will carry our efforts into the future. It is gratifying to realize how far we have come, but still, it peeves me to realize how far we have yet to go.

I look forward to a strong alliance, not only between the NNPA and the local, state and national organizations to which I belong, but also between all our organized groups across the country.

Congratulations.

To The Editor:

I want to express my personal thanks to you for working hard to bring a prestigious group like NNPA to the Hyatt Winston-Salem. The cooperation of yourself and others involved was appreciated very much.

We were honored as a staff to host this fine group and to demonstrate true Southern hospitality. I heard several very kind remarks from the attendees regarding our Southern hospitality.

We recognize that it is your position in this organization and the national recognition the Chronicle has received that steered this meeting to Winston-Salem. We wish you and your staff continued success in the future.

portant. Privatizing education through vouchers doesn't meet government's responsibilities — it evades them.

The voucher plan should be seen in the context of both national educational needs and current federal social policies.

We should remember that the administration has long backed various tuition refund plans for the middle class. Those didn't fly, so we have to suspect that the current voucher-for-the-poor proposal is a stalking horse for later across-the-board educational subsidies for more affluent families.

This is also an administration that has demonstrated its indifference to civil rights enforcement, even to the extent of trying to win tax-exempt status for segregated academies. Again, the vouchers could be a way to stem the tide of desegregation, giving white families the means to escape integrated schools.

By de-emphasizing the one institution — the public school — that has traditionally served to provide common ground for all, the government would be further fragmenting a divided society.

The bottom line should be quality education for all children, and until the government convincingly demonstrates that a voucher system would meet that goal, it should concentrate its efforts on making the public schools deliver quality education.

perspiration; tiredness and weakness; possible headache and cramps; dizziness; nausea or vomiting and possible fainting, and

- heat stroke — high body temperature of 106 degrees or higher; hot, red, dry skin due to lack of perspiration; strong, rapid pulse and possible delirium or unconsciousness.

"Heat stroke is very serious and can be fatal," Dundon says.

"A person exhibiting symptoms of heat stroke should see a physician or get to a hospital immediately."

There were two heat-related deaths reported in North Carolina in 1984 and 25 in 1983, according to Dr. J.N. MacCormack, chief of the epidemiology section for the N.C. Department of Human Resources. Statistics for 1985 are not yet available.

Dundon suggests several ways to beat the heat:

- Drink plenty of liquids, as much as 50 percent more than normal thirst requires. Water is better than soft drinks.
- Stay out of direct sunlight.
- Avoid alcoholic beverages.
- Try to stay in a cool, well-ventilated area. People without air-conditioned homes might want to visit an air-conditioned building, such as a shopping center or library.

every justification to do just as the Italians did in 1948.

But black voters in Newark got precisely what they re-elected in 1986 — more poverty, illiteracy, unemployment, homeless children and crime.

These problems will only be addressed politically by blacks when they recognize what the U.S. Supreme Court said in its recent rulings on affirmative action: Race must be taken into account in a racist society where race is used to elevate one group and oppress another.

Historian

"He told the captain he could not sell his relatives into slavery," Fleming said. "The ship left him behind, and nothing more was heard of him."

But he had fathered several children in America, among them one known as "Big Alf." Alf had a son named Alfred, who had a son named Isaac. They lived in three plantations near Morganton — Magnolia, Belvedere and Swan Pond.

Isaac, Fleming's great-grandfather, was the last to live in slavery, and when freedom came he put farm work behind him. A white foreman helping construct a state mental institution taught him how to lay brick, and he in turn taught his father.

Together, they went into business. "They built chimneys all over western North Carolina," Fleming said.

Most of the family remains in and around Morganton, and the name Alfred is still common among them. The family has prospered: Fleming's uncle is the former president of Shaw University in Raleigh, his brother is a barber, his sister works for the Tennessee Valley Authority in Knoxville.

And Fleming himself is a trained historian, working on a project to give black Americans the same sense of history he secured for himself when he encountered Tamishan.
