

Actress Impacts Lives

character makes a connection to reality," she said. "People come backstage and talk to you; some even cry," she said.

Jones, 24, who has appeared in numerous productions, didn't start acting until she enrolled in college. She has performed before audiences all her life, mostly as a musician, but says she always wanted to be an actor.

"I have always been interested in theater and film and composing music for theater," she said. "It's a lot of work, but I love it."

Jones prefers being called an actor instead of an actress because she believes an "actor is an actor" regardless of sex.

"I take pride in that name (actor)," Jones said. "I work very hard, and I'm very good at what I do."

This female performer may not like being referred to in the feminine sense in her work, but she is a strong advocate for better portrayals of women on television and film. She said most women are not portrayed as strong females; instead they have to look beautiful, and most are not well educated.

"I'd like to own some sort of theater or production company to represent all nationalities."

"Women are terribly exploited by film and television," Jones said. "They aren't always portrayed as intelligent people who can make choices for themselves. Everybody has to do film and television to make money, but I chose not to take that route."

Jones also said black women are usually cast into roles as prostitutes, and when blacks are making love on screen it's presented as being savage. As a young playwright who enjoys Shakespearean theater, Jones hopes to one day produce plays that will show positive images of all people.

"I'd like to own some sort of theater or production company to represent all nationalities," she said. "The film industry is very one-sided, and the real story never gets told."

Jones is a politically-minded and socially-conscious person, but said she would rather change people's lives through acting instead of politics. The actor, when his mind, body and spirit are totally into the character, she says, becomes like the shaman who can uplift the spirit of the people.

"It's my job to know what's going on. Sometimes it hurts to find out what's going on around you," she said. "I deal with it as a character on stage. My destiny in life is to perform and give life to people."
