Locals Participate in Medical Project

During the past six weeks, Flonnie T. Anderson and Jeannette T. Lewis participated in a project at Bowman Gray School of Medicine designed to improve the teaching of and the art of practicing medicine in this country.

Anderson and Lewis served as "standardized patients" who acted the role of a patient with a specific disease and were questioned individually by a fourth-year medical student in a sound-proof enclosure. About 80 four-year students participated in this project.

This project was initiated due to the growing concern by many in and out of the medical field that being a doctor is more than just having a mastery of facts. The project was also initiated out of a need to develop an instrument which will assess how students preparing for the medical profession can ascertain all of the pertinent facts about an illness, while at the same time maintain the solid trust and respect of the patient.

Last year, the four medical schools in North Carolina (Bowman Gray, Duke, UNCW, and ECU) formed a consortium and competed with 13 similar groups throughout the United States and won a $500,000 grant from the Josiah Macy Jr. Foundation of New York. The grant was awarded to support the development and refinement of a Clinical Practice Examination (CPX) designed to evaluate the knowledge, communication skill and personal behaviors of future physicians in dealing with patients.

The CPX was developed by a group of faculty members from the four North Carolina medical schools working together. It is now being used at these schools this summer for the first time. Dr. Martha G. Camp, associate professor of Medical Education at Bowman Gray, is the co-principal investigator for the Macy grant.

Anderson and Lewis were recommended for and chosen to participate in the project.

Experience gained from administering and refining the CPX is expected to positively affect medical education and doctoring throughout the United States.

Birthday Celebration

Sarah J. Boone, in conjunction with the Winston-Salem Duplicate Bridge Club, honored their husband and game director, respectively, with a 66th birthday celebration prior to the Tuesday night bridge game. Refreshments were served. Cards and gifts were presented. In addition to the game winners listed above, the following club members and guest enjoyed the celebration/game: Lillie Cuthrell, Clester Hickerson, Ruby Walker, Juanita Wynecoff, Demerice Erwin, Dorothy Stephens, Sandra Brown, Billie Matthews, Geneva Hill, Elizabeth Lewis, Pauline Caldwell, Floyd Neal, Jean Joyner, Harriet Smith and Ruth Washington.

Billie Matthews made the birthday cake and provided decorations (signs and balloons) for the celebration.

The celebration idea was the fulfillment of a request from "Rudy" in response to his wife, Sarah's question, "How do you the largest non-tournament game in years for the local players. Everyone had a great time! Have many more happy birthdays R.V.!

The Winston-Salem Duplicate Bridge Club welcomes its newest member, James Payne, a recent graduate of R.V. Boone's bridge class. Payne and his wife, Margaret (finished Boone's class earlier in the year) played their first bridge game together on July 19 and won first place in a six-table game. Congratulations to the Paynes for their great start in bridge!

Next week will be Summer Nationals time, Aug. 4-14, in Detroit, Mich. Several local players will be participating in that big event. Best wishes to them!

The next big event (tournament) will be the Tidewater Bridge Unit's Grade "A" at the Virginia Beach Resort Hotel Sept. 17-19. Other than the nationals, this event is usually highly successful. Reservations should be made by Sept. 1. Local players are expected to be geared up for both events. Study! Play!

Area Woman to Compete in Pageant

Diane C. Hightower of Kernersville is a contestant in the Mrs. North Carolina Pageant, which will be held Aug. 14 at Ovens Auditorium in Charlotte.

Hightower is the wife of the Rev. Eddie J. Hightower and will compete with other married women from across the state for the title, which is now held by Julie Kosten VanHoy of Charlotte.

Hightower will join other contestants in interview, swimsuit and evening gown competitions.

The new Mrs. North Carolina will represent her state in the nationally broadcast Mrs. America Pageant, which will be aired this fall.

Rev. & Mrs. Hightower are members of Bethlehem Baptist Church, where E.L. Clark Sr. is pastor. They are the parents of Caresse Hightower, a sophomore at East Forsyth High School.
