CEO writes children's book

Dr. Tony Lewis L. Burton III, chief executive officer of Northwest Child Development Centers Inc. in Winston-Salem, signs a book for Sonya Weaks. He held a book signing at Galilee Missionary Baptist Church on Sunday, April 24. Burton co-wrote the children's book, with Chinaemeze Kelsey Okoro, as president and lead strategist of TLBurton and Associates, which is a consulting, business development and coaching business. The book is the beginning of a series that will feature characters named Emma and Mason. The current book is called, "Emma and Mason's First Day of School." The books are designed to encourage children to read. Adult victim of bullying helps others on road to recovery in his new book

BY RUDY ANDERSON
SPECIAL TO THE CHRONICLE

You have been victimized by bullies throughout your middle school and high school years. You are an adult now, and you survived those horrible years of psychological and physical abuse. But, there is a problem.

Winston-Salem author Mark Stewart in his new book "Names Will Hurt Me: Healing for Victims of Bullying" strives to help victims validate their pain; illustrate how damage from the trauma can sabotage careers and relationships; and begin the healing process.

An underexplored area in bullying is the effect it has on people in their adult years. Coping is a key focus of the book.

Stewart vividly details his harrowing experience as a victim of bullying, the manifestations of that experience as a young adult, and how he coped on the road to healing.

Untold thousands of people are likely to see themselves contained with in the confines of Stewart's gripping and often graphic recall of his experience.

He writes, "My struggle to overcome the psychological damage from the bullying led me to write this book."

Stewart would be the first to tell you he has come a long way from being the scared victim of bullies and troubled young man as a result of the bullying to the man he has become today.

Today, Stewart is a graduate of Southern Illinois University in Carbondale, Ill., where he earned both a B.A. degree in English and an M.A. degree in Mass Communications and Media Arts. He is a well-adjusted husband and father with more than 20 years of experience as a writer, photographer and graphic designer.
