Local hoops legend rises above setbacks

BY TIMOTHY RAMSEY THE CHRONICLE

Colonel "Buck" Reinhardt grew up in the "pond area" of Winston-Salem. He was an all-around athlete who played football, basketball, baseball and track and field.

Basketball, however, is where Reinhardt found his niche. He would later go on to average over 20 points and 20 rebounds per game in 1973. Reinhardt let a setback his junior year derail his career, but not his dreams, however.

He credits the Lord for his comebacks. Reinhardt got into playing basketball after his father hung a hoop on a tree beside his house for his older cousin to shoot on when he visited from out of town. He says once he learned about Wilt Chamberlain's 100-point game and Winston-Salem State University's (WSSU's) own Earl "The Pearl" Monroe's 67-point game against Fayetteville State, his whole outlook on the game changed.

"At home, I would practice shooting all day, every day," said Reinhardt. "The guys in the neighborhood would start to come over to shoot and play at my house. I would eventually learn the game and learn it well."

Once in junior high school Reinhardt quickly made a name for himself and was the starting center on the Northwest Junior High School team. In the ninth grade at Hanes Junior High School, the team was loaded with great talent, such as Larry Haney, Larry Rucker, and Michael Epps. Reinhardt was cut during tryouts. It devastated him.

"For the first time I felt bitterness and I had a feeling of, 'I'll show him,'" Reinhardt said. "I knew I was good enough to make the team. I was determined to someday put up numbers like Wilt Chamberlain, Spencer Haywood, and 'Pistol' Pete Maravich."

Instead of letting the fact he was cut defeat him, Reinhardt instead took to per-
