Skimping on Feed Is False Economy

A mistaken sense of economy frequently induces poultrymen to feed their hens sparingly during the moulting period.

But attemps to save feed at this time will cost the poultrymen in the long run, warns Roy S. Dearstyne, extension poultry specialist at State College.

When birds are fed scratch 1,250,000.00 feed alone or only a limited amount of mash, he pointed out, the moulting period is prolonged and they are unable to put on the necessary weight to carry them through the next laying sea-

The result is a drop in egg production that more than offsets the money saved by skimping on feed, Dearstyne explained. Moulting birds have passed through a heavy laying period which taxed their vitality and reduced their body weight. They are also losing feathers which must be replaced.

The birds need a balanced diet with plenty of protein to build up their muscular and glandular tissue and to grow new feathers. A balanced mash and a liberal ration of scratch feed should be before the birds at all times.

Since most poultry flocks are more or less infected with intestinal parasites, it is advisable to deworm moulting birds not in lay. This will insure better health 26,976.16 during the laying year.

Late moulters and birds laying through the moulting period are considered most profitable, Dearstyne continued. An abundance of good feed will help keep the birds in lay and shorten the period required for moulting.
