DALE CARNEGIE

Author of "How to Win Friends and Influence People."

DALE CARNEGIE ... A few years ago a family named Carlson landed in Duluth, Minnesota, from Sweden. One of the boys was named Charles. He was five years old.

He went to school, learned the English language. The family was poor, and the boy had to do something to bring in money. He got a job selling papers. But the family multiplied, so when the boy was fourteen he had to give up school and spend all his time selling newspapers.

As he stood on the street calling out his papers, he wondered how he could get ahead in the world. How could a newsboy with little education get ahead? Tough question.

One day, as he delivered a paper, he saw a young man writing shorthand to his boss's dictation. It made an impression on him. That young man must know everything that was going on in the office. He was near the important people. That was a way to get ahead in the world!

He asked an older friend what he thought of the idea. The friend discouraged him. Said he didn't have enough education to learn shorthand.

But the boy believed so thoroughly in his idea that he decided to go ahead with it, anyway. He didn't have enough money to take a business college course. After inquiring around he heard of a woman who knew shorthand and might be willing to teach him. He saw her, persuaded her, started to study.

He sold papers during the day; went to her three nights a week. Finally he could write shorthand. Now to give his idea a trial!

He selected a railroad office, applied for a job and got it. Words he had never heard of were tossed at him; that night, at home, he dug them out of a dictionary and wrote their definitions over and over in shorthand. He was advanced to secretary of one of the managers, and soon was taking dictation on important matters concerning the railroad. He did more than take and type a letter. He studied it; asked himself why certain statements were made; tried to get the manager's point of view. He learned more and more about the railroad business.

He was promoted. Promoted again. He had a broader, more comprehensive knowledge of the business, than other juniors in the office.

Finally he was elected manager; and now he was the one who was dictating the letters. Then he was elected president of the road—the Duluth Mesabi and Iron Range. It hauls the rich iron ore from the mines north and west of Duluth, and is one of the most prosperous railroads in the country.

Charles E. Carlson did something almost any young man can do. He learned to be a stenographer. He took advantage of the opportunity to find out all he could about the business, and advanced himself. Don't look at letter dictation as dull routine, but find a way to learn about the business. That simple idea made one stenographer president of a railroad.

County Women Combat Cancer

Mrs. L. C. Fergus of Southport is in charge of County-wide Campaign for Brunswick

In a statement issued last week Governor Clyde R. Hoey urged North Carolinians to observe April as "Cancer Control Month."

Mrs. L. C. Fergus is in charge of the Brunswick county-wide campaign put on by the Women's Field Army for the control of cancer. She stresses the fact that persons from all parts of the county will be called on to contribute to this deserving cause.

Governor Hoey's statement is as follows:

"The month of April has been designated by Presidential and Congressional authorization as Cancer Control Month for the entire United States and the General Assembly of North Carolina has joined the national authorities in authorizing the observance of this month by the people of North Carolina.

"I am directing the attention of the public to the importance of this campaign for the discovery, treatment and cure of cancer. The whole medical authority unite in advising that most of the cases of cancer are curable if discovered in time and therefore that an early examination for cancer and prompt attention given to the first danger signals apparent constitute the best possible protection against this plague.

"The whole field force of public health is engaged in directing the public mind to the danger of cancer infection and to the imperative need for early attention and treatment when any of the symptoms are discovered. I join heartily in emphasizing the fine work which the women's field army has been accomplishing and I call upon all the people of this State to give support to the campaign and to assist in raising the funds to carry on this educational program for the general protection of the whole public. Since cancer ranks second among diseases as the destroyer of human life and since this disease has steadily increased its toll in recent years, it is of utmost importance that we give full assistance to the women in this educational campaign which will be conducted throughout the month of April."
