

Rural Fat Salvage Provides Crop Aids

FAT saved at butchering time, from fallen animals, and kitchen salvage comes right back to the farm in the form of fungicides, insecticides, synthetic rubber for tires, protective coating for farm implements, certain veterinary preparations, protective fabrics, lubricants, fertilizer, animal feeds, leather dressings and many more essentials.

In urban areas, owing to greater difficulty of making pick-ups in thinly settled areas. Now, however, arrangements have been made to collect fats from all communities, so salvage from farms, where fat is relatively plentiful, is soaring.

1945 Goal Up

Goal for kitchen fat salvage in 1945 is 250,000,000 pounds — or 80,000,000 more than was saved in 1944. Because many of the meats which yield the most fat are seldom found in city markets, a special appeal is being made to rural homemakers to save and deliver large amounts of fat which can be no longer used in cooking, or which may be in excess of a farm family's need.

During 1945, with lower supplies of domestic fats and oils, and with our principal sources of imports cut off, America must turn to the kitchens of American homemakers to obtain used household fat for military, industrial and civilian use.

GIVES HINTS FOR STRETCHING SUGAR

sorghum, may cause the fruit to spoil. Saccharin should not be used as it may give the canned food a bitter flavor. Fruit juices can be canned this summer and made into jelly later. Sugar for this could be saved from the regular ration if sirups, honey, and molasses are used in baking. Fruit butters take proportionally less sugar and should be made instead of some of the jellies, jams, and preserves which require more sugar.

If a homemaker has used her canning sugar ration wisely and still has fruits, she can can them without sugar, however, they are not as good. Sugar helps canned fruit hold color and flavor but it does not prevent spoilage. Unsweetened fruit is processed in the same way as sweetened.

Both jars and closures are expected to be available in adequate amounts throughout the year. Be sure to read and follow manufacturers' directions for using jar closures. This applies to all canning equipment.

Farm Wives Help

A recent survey of rural areas indicates that the majority of farm families do save fat, and that more than half turn in their salvaged fat, after using what they need for household purposes. But a considerable number of housewives reported they could save more. A few reported that difficulties in disposing of fat they had saved discouraged them from further effort.

It is true that fat collection in the country has lagged behind that
