New Yorker Is Here For Winter

Long Island Truck Grower Has Come Down To Get Former Dr. Doshier Residence In Shape For Winter Occupancy

M. L. Lindner of H. Lindner and Sons, truck growers of Long Island, N. Y., is in Southport making arrangements to move his family to their winter home, the old Dr. J. A. Doshier residence, on the Supply road. Extensively engaged in truck crop growing at Long Island, the Lindner's grew much of their early truck crop plants in Brunswick county last year, transporting them to Long Island by truck as soon as all danger of killing frost was over up there.

Pleased with the results, they invested a considerable sum in a Brunswick county home and land and will produce all of their early plants here. Until last year they relied largely on hot-house grown plants. Mr. Lindner says that the plants produced here were much stronger and healthier than the hot-house variety. They were able to set them out in the fields a great deal earlier than they could set out the more tenderly reared product, without danger of killing by frost.

Hehe this winter and until the very early spring, they will devote themselves chiefly to growing lettuce, cabbage and pepper plants for the first year. They will return to Long Island in the spring to look after their truck farming.

Work Continues On Plant Farm

Everet H. Sheppard of Shiloh, N. J. is now back at his tomato plant producing farm on the River Road. Along with clearing over 20 acres of land he is building three small residences on his property.

Bulldozers are being used to clear the land and it will be planted in watermelons this first year, the ground being too fresh for tomato plant production. The land being cleared now will be added to his tomato plant production acreage next year and more land will be cleared next winter for melons.

This year his tomato plants for use on New Jersey tomato farms will be grown on land cleared last year and planted in watermelons. The Sheppard farm is composed of 145 acres and it is planned to ultimately use all of it for the growth of tomato plants.
