LOCUSTS FLY A HAIRLINE
LONDON—(AP)—Locusts have queer short hairs on their heads which give them directions when flying. This discovery is reported in "Nature," the official British science journal, by T. Weis-Fogh of Gentofte, Denmark. The hairs are queer because they do not vibrate in the wind as do other hairs on a locust. These merely bend. Something in their structure prevents fast waving motions. By the angle at which these hairs bend a locust knows how much he is turning away from a straight line. When he is flying straight the wind bends the hair
