THEIR OPINIONS.

All Opinions Generally Differ.

It is atterly impossible for all to It is atterly impossible for all to see alike even in the business interests of a town. Some think one thing is quite beneficial, others think it is of no value and what the latter thinks its a trade getter, the former thinks is worthless. There is nothing strange in such a condition of mortals having different tem-perments and a man usually thinks the most laviting is that which is the most pleasing to himself. The most successful business man is not the one who can impect a line of samples and select what suits him, but the one who can select what will please his trade. We should cultivate a generous spirit and be ready to not only conceed others.

Cheir views but he willing to place our shoulder to the wheel of present our should be some of the same of the control of the whole of the should be shoul gress which we see a unspecifical legistrate with respect things; we could consider a possibility that so may be would and to a may be right. Anothere is another class in minimal possibility that so may be would and to a may be right. Anothere is another class in minimal possibility that so may be would and to a may be right. Anothere is another class of the sound fixing. It is the extract who has no business in the extract who has no business in the town, in fact, has no more interest in it than that he lives there who is trying to dictate how the business of the town should be there who is trying to dictate how the business of the town should be continued. We are not saying any thing against his more standing as continued. We are not saying any timing against his moral standing as a circum, but we hardly see any groun ason why he should stand as a circum. If the town does not sun into his power all others is prepar into move to a more congenial to the his nothing to lose by the last his proper and ceaning the his nothing to lose by the last section of the his nothing to lose by the last section of the last nothing to lose by the last section of the last nothing to lose by the last section of the last nothing to lose by the last section of the last

From a little shop near by col Rothholts, the vanchmaker, glanced out of his window at the group, shock his head at them, then turned and resumed his work. The day before his con had Gault swore that she had seen ber with her own eyes vomiting crooked plus."

"What! That innocent girl condemned for witcheraft on the testimony of that hag?"

"Yes, and she is to be burned at the sinke in three days. Oh, father, help! We are betrothed!"

The youngster, still in his teens, had not ceased to rely on his father for yeary thing. The old man scratched his head and gave himself up to deep thought. Precently he said, "I cannot prevent this tragedy, but I may delay it."

"How?" asked the boy ergerly. "You know, my son, that the clock in the church tower, which ! made and about which no one except myself knows anything, is the legal time in the village—that I, the town clerk as well as waitshmaker, keep the legal ratendar and keep it by the clock. If I stop the clock I stop the village time, 20 00 but in that case they would adopt an other standard. I will make the hands go very slowly. This will delay the execution, and something may happen to save the girl."

In the makile of the night the old man went up into the tower and change of the clock's rate to one hour in twenty four. Cleffy could not be legally self knows anything, is the legal time the clock's rate to one hour in twenty-four. Cleffy could not be legally burned for more than two menuits.

The group standing in the market place after further discussion moved thin that the clock had nearly stopped and he must fix it. "Don't houser your leads about the clock," he said: "it will see well enough in time." "What will see well enough in time." "What has that to do with 12" 'I don't know. I out know that he clock, which has kept perfect time our since which has kept perfect time—er since to a it was set up to the tow—has set, denly gone wro..." "No—nee" ex-sistent and the par and ther changed most of the party and ther went away.

The old man insisted to the could not fix the clock, though, is satisfy the sutherlies, he recented to try. In a few days the turnbers, finding a new subject of interest, ceased to talk subject of interest, ceased to talk about the clock. A week later Antoine Hocker presented a note that was due to Karl Becker for payment. Becker declared that he would pay it when the town clock should say the time for payment had expired. Hecker went to knothled and asked for a certificate to that effect. He her declared tificate to that effect. He her declared that by the vilinac time the note was not due. The result was a quarrel between the delater and the creditor.
