SAVING THE MEAT CROP

Most harvest seasons and harves results are largely dependent upon weather conditions when the harvest son comes. One great Southern crop may be made absolutely independ ent of such uncertainties. The annual ment harvest may be conducted irrespective of the vicissitudes of weather. Our great hog crop may be harvested when it is ready for harvest. Yet most farmers look anxiously for the first cold days of November for beginning the intermittent work of saving ment. Too often the whole winter eason does not bring the longed-for supply of cold days. The inevitable result is that risk is taken and meat spoils from lack of cold weather, o the unshughtered hogs cat up all possi ble profits of the owner while he waits for weather to his liking. It is doubtful which is the greater predicament -to lose ment from spoiling because killed in warm 'weather, or to lose money because of waste of feed while waiting for better weather, which, per-

It is really more feasible and prac ical to control the meat harvest, and insure results, then with any other rop or product of the farm. Indeed with the saving of most crops we are largely dependent upon weather conditions, and artificial control of these conditions is seldom possible. meat-saving the case is radically dif-ferent. Here artificial conditions are not only feasible, but absolute control of results follows. The reason why cool weather is preferred for curing ment is because the carcoss slaughtered is warm with animal heat. Heat favors decay. To get rid of or overcome heat is the first step in pre venting decay. Fresh meat, therefore should be chilled through as soon possible after killing. It should be thoroughly chilled to the very bone. It is then easy to keep without spoil-ing if protected from other agents of

This is the explanation for the influence of weather on the preservation of meat. Yet the professional packer kills and saves meat every day in the er—in July as well as in December The reason for his independence is that he provides artificial cooling for that he provides artificial cooling for his meat. He depends upon refractation or ice rather than cold weather of The same independence—insurance of results—is cheaply available on pearly eyery Southern farm, All that is necessary is to pack the meat in ire until it is chillen to the bone, the method first advocated by us, at the flounds Experiment Station some sixteen years ago and since very extensional and since very ex mish manipas followater it that standard standar Let bong one night, then cut as pre-ferred for curing.
