OUR WASHINGTON LETTER

(From our Regular Correspondent.)

It may not be possible for the Senate, in the midst of such a flight as they now have on hand, to stop and make a change in the rules under which they have been operating for a hundred years. It seems inevitable, however, that some means must be provided by which a vote may be reached on measures which have the support of a majority. The present experience will probably teach the Senate a lesson from which they may profit in the future. Whether the repeal, unconditionally, of the Sherman law be viewed by a Senator as wise or otherwise, the opinion prevails in Administration circles that he cannot fairly question the propriety of the Senate's having an opportunity at some time to pass judgment on it. But there is more than the silver question involved in this. If the consent of the minority must be had before any measure can come to a vote, there is manifestly no chance for tariff legislation, or for any important legislation concerning which there is a radical difference of opinion. Measures which receive unanimous consent are usually unimportant.

A repeal Senator expressed the situation in the Senate today by saying that they were surrounded by a dense fog and could not see ahead of them. It had been demonstrated, he said, that the anti-repeal men had force enough to keep up a filibuster indefinitely if they were so disposed. "At present," he said, "they seem determined to fight until the Voorhees bill is killed." This appears to be very nearly the situation as well as anyone can understand it. It is evident enough that if the men opposing Voorhees are determined to filibuster until the bill is dead they have it in their power to do so.

The conditions under the present rules of the Senate open up the prospect of a very general failure of legislation during the Fifty-third Congress. It would not be surprising if the House, without difficulty, should pass all the important measures which the democratic managers have in contemplation and that all these measures should come up against a solid stone wall in the Senate, rendering this Congress impotent. There seems to be no doubt that the House will get through its legislation with considerable expedition, and it would be a curious spectacle to have a very business-like House disposing of measures with a free hand and everything gorged in the Senate. A great many men in both houses foresee such a situation. The bill for the repeal of the federal election laws will doubtless pass the House by a considerable majority. Having finished their Hearing the committee on ways and means are going to work at once to the revision of the tariff and they expect to have their bill reported to the House during the first week of November.

Washington will soon have a hand some equestrian statue of Logan, and likewise one of Sheridan. The Capital city is rich in its memorials of the great soldiers of the nation. This is due to the fact that the leaders of the war leave behind them associates who take a special pride in honoring their memories in this way, and to the great army societies Washington is indebted for nearly all of the statues that adorn its parks. When the civilian statesman dies, no matter how great his service to his country, there is no organization ready to honor him by erecting a statue at the National Capital. If they have statues erected in their honor, the movement and the funds must come from the people at large. Thus the soldiers of the land fare better in the way of memorials than the statesmen who have shaped the policy of the nation, and made much of its history. Washington is proud of and grateful of its military statues. It is with no disloyalty to the memory of those brave soldiers that a wish is expressed that there could be a way provided for securing statues of great civil leaders, to round out the history told by the city's memorials.

Familiar faces in the great sociopolitical kaleidoscope meet the daily promenade in Washington at every turn nowadays, and the streets begin to take on a livelier appearance. Society has got back to town, and the return of Vanity Fair puts new life in the social current and gives the stay at home something fresh to talk about. One problem that everybody is answering according to his own lights is whether or not Washington is going to be gay the coming winter. Judging from the past experiences this city is never unduly festive the first winter after the induction of a new administration. It has become apparent, however, in the record of the past few years, that a winter of social activity in this city does not entirely depend on the official side of society, and it is not believed that the hard times will have an appreciable effect on the coming "season" at the Capital.

A resolution to restore the parity of the legislative, executive and judicial departments of the Government, with particular reference to the first two, was the contribution of Senator Stewart to the Senate calendar last week. It sets forth that the independence of these branches must be maintained, and that the use of the power and influence of one department to control the action of another is a violation of the Constitution.

The appointment of Hornblower of New York to the vacancy on the Supreme Bench caused by the death of the lamented Justice Blatchford serves to make emphatic the poet's intimation that there is not much in a name.

WISE WORDS.

To be hungry, ragged and penniless is not pleasant, but this is nothing to the horror of bankruptcy. All the wealth of the Rothschilds would be a poor recompense for a five years struggle, with the consciousness that you had taken the money or property of trusting friends, promising to return or pay for it when required, and had betrayed their confidence through insolvency.

I dwell on this point, for I would deter others from entering that place of torment. Half the young men in the country, with many old enough to know better, "would go into business"—that is into debt—to-morrow, if they could. Most poor men are so ignorant as to envy the merchant or manufacturer whose life is an incessant struggle with pecuniary difficulties, who is driven to constant "shinning," and who from month to month, barely evades that insolvency which, sooner or later, overtakes most men in business, so that it has been computed that but one in twenty of them achieves a pecuniary success.

For my own part, and I speak from sad experience, I had rather be a convict in the State prison, a slave in the rice swamps, than to pass through life in the horror of debt.

A Little Girl's Experience in a Lighthouse.

Mr. and Mrs. Loren Treacott are keepers of the Gov. Lighthouse at Sand Beach, Miss., and are blessed with a daughter, four years old. Last April she was taken down with Measles, followed with a dreadful Cough and turning into a Fever. Doctors at home and at Detroit treated her, but in vain, she grew worse rapidly, until she was a mere "handful of bones."—Then she tried Dr. King's New Discovery for Consumption and after the use of two and a half bottles, was completely cured. They say Dr. King's New Discovery is worth its weight in gold, yet you may get a trial bottle free at Harper & Hood's Drugstore.

Let no young man misjudge himself unfortunate, or truly poor, so long as he has the full use of his limbs and faculties, and is substantially free from debt.

Hunger, cold, rags, hard work, contempt, suspicion, unjust reproach, are disagreeable; but debt is infinitely worse than them all. And if it had pleased God to spare either or all my sons to be the support and solace of my declining years, the lesson which I should have most earnestly sought to impress upon them is: "Never run into debt! Avoid pecuniary obligations as you would pestilence or famine. If you can get but fifty cents, and can get no more for a week, buy a peck of corn parch it and live on it, rather than owe any man a dollar."

Of course I know that some men must do business that involves risks and must give notes and other obligations; and I do not consider him fully in debt who can lay hands directly on the means of paying, at some little sacrifice, all he owes. I speak of real debt, that which involves risk or sacrificing on the one side, obligations and dependence on the other—and I say, from all such let every youth humbly pray God to preserve him ever more!—Horace Greely in New York Ledger.
