The Father of Chemistry

WHAT makes a fire burn? If you were asked this question, you might be hard put to give a reasonable answer. As a matter of fact, no one in the whole world could answer it until Laurent Lavoisier, the famous French scientist, discovered oxygen in the eighteenth century.

Besides giving oxygen its name and explaining its properties, Lavoisier was the first man to show why hydrogen and oxygen combined to form water. Because he made so many fundamental contributions to the world of science, he is now generally known as the "Father of Chemistry."

But Lavoisier was far more than a famous scientist. Handsome and witty, he was also a prominent courtier in the Courts of Louis XV and XVI. He was a friend of Marie Antoinette and was always in the thick of royal intrigues and politics.

When the French revolution broke out, he was in the thick of that. He witnessed the roaring fall of the Bastille. He invented a new way of making saltpeter, the essential element in gunpowder. Famous chemist though he was, Lavoisier was finally thrown into prison by the fanatical Robespierre, who said he had no use for any scientists, especially aristocratic ones.

Those were the days when Paris streets were running red with human blood. Being an aristocrat, Lavoisier was soon on his way to the guillotine. He died as he had lived, laughing and unafraid. A friend who witnessed the execution wrote his memorial: "It took but a moment to cut off his head, but another like it cannot be produced in a hundred years."

Military Uniforms

LOUIS XIV, the depraved French king, really brought on the French revolution through his avarice and cruelty to his people. A most disorderly man himself, his greatest contribution to posterity was his reintroduction of the military uniform, the forerunner of modern standardized goods.

Although regular uniforms had been worn by Greek and Roman soldiers, the art was lost during the Middle Ages. Since soldiers fought in small bands, they could either recognize each other personally or wear some identifying badge which distinguished them from the enemy.

But Louis XIV built up the largest army Europe had ever known up to that time, a huge force of 100,000 men. He gave orders to his generals, "Drill them to act as one, discipline them to respond as one, uniform them to look as one!"

The generals could do the drilling and disciplining without any trouble, but when it came to the uniforms they were up against a new problem. Making 100,000 uniforms that all look exactly alike is no small problem. The generals were finally forced to build up a whole new textile and clothing industry and install the first modern system of standardized goods and sizes.

So when you go into a department store to buy a size seven shoe or a fifteen collar, remember that it was old Louis XIV and his aides who first thought up the idea.
