

Toxaway Man Catches Rattlesnakes For Profit

(By Mrs. H. D. Lee)

H. H. (Kim) Miller of the Toxaway section, catches snakes and makes money out of the work, as well as deriving a lot of pleasure.

Mr. Miller catches snakes as a hobby, and as he puts it, "for my bread and butter." He caught thousands of rattlers during the past 35 years, and has yet to be bitten, although he admits it is pretty risky business, and emphatically warns amateurs against doing the thing he does practically every day during the summer and early fall.

A leather thing, a short piece of stick, and a sharp pocketknife are Mr. Miller's principal stock in trade for catching the most poisonous reptiles to be found in Western North Carolina.

After he has made his catch, he removes the poison sacs and connecting fangs from the upper jaws of the rattlers, and then keeps them in a large box-cage until he is ready to kill them and tan or mount the hides.

"Plenty of people are willing to pay good money for live snakes, and I find my job more profitable in many ways than trying to farm at my age," the 63-year-old native of Upper Transylvania explained when asked why he had chosen such a dangerous vocation.

"Snakes only bite scared people," the veteran hunter said, "unless they are accidentally disturbed, and then, they only bite for protection of themselves."

Mr. Miller calculates that he has handled several thousand snakes during his lifetime, and while he admits that any number have tried to sink their fangs into his hands and arms, he has always been "just a mite smarter than the snake" and always keeps in mind just what the snake is apt to try when it is being handled.

Mr. Miller showed the writer just how a snake should be handled and like the story about rabbit stew, first step was to find the snake. A large black rattler was found near Cotton Rock on the slopes of Toxaway Mountain.

Lying half-coiled in the edge of some sparse grass, the snake quickly coiled at approach of the "snake man" and started his nerve-tingling, dry-sounding warning. Taking a two-foot leathery thong with loop on its end from his pocket, Mr. Miller tied the thing to the end of a short stick, and "eased up" behind a stone in back of the snake. In less time than it takes to read this paragraph the noise was slipped over the rattler's head, and there was 34 inches of wriggling snake ready for the "tourist trade."

Holding the rattler's head taut away from its coiled body, Mr. Miller reached down with his free hand and grasped it by the neck, holding it in such a way that its jaws were pried open and the curved fangs plainly showing to the man with a pencil and kodak good distance.

Mr. Miller has caught as many as a dozen snakes in one day, which he sold to tourists at from one dollar to ten each, depending upon the coloring, and process which the hide had been given. Sometimes he is lucky and finds five or six snakes in one den in a rock cliff, but more often, he said, the larger snakes are alone.

He said that the rattlers are now "denning up" for the winter, and that the frost early last week will drive most of the reptiles into their winter quarters where they take their young which are born in the fall of the year. A large snake will give birth to from seven to ten young rattlers that will average about eight to ten inches in length, and are born "ready to bite."

The mother snake will come out of her den on warm days late in the fall, Mr. Miller said, and the young ones are always nearby. He is emphatic in his statement that a young rattler runs into its mother's mouth when danger approaches.

A rattler is a proud thing, the hunter said, and if made angry and no way of escape left open, will sink its fangs into its body and commit suicide.

There is always a demand for snake hides, Mr. Miller said, and very often he sells live snakes, some of which still retain their fangs and poison sacs, although the average tourist prefers his snake with fangs removed.

A snake will live several months in a cage without food, Mr. Miller said, and positively refuse to eat while kept in a small enclosure. A rattler only eats what he "charms" before killing, the hunter said, and then an average size rattler can gorge himself with a half-grown rabbit, squirrel or several partridges and lie in a semi-conscious state for days while he digests his food.

Mr. Miller was born and reared near Sapphire, a son of the late Henry Miller and Nancy Lowe Miller. His father was a Confederate veteran, and upon his return from the war married, and set up in the hotel or "hostelry business" as it was then called.

The tavern stood near what is now Sapphire postoffice, and Mr. Miller's early recollection of "low-landers" was their arrival in covered hacks with baggage piled high on top. The tourists often spent four and five months at the Miller "hostelry" and enjoyed the fine trout fishing in Horse Pasture river nearby. The hotel was constructed of logs and has long since rotted down.

Mr. Miller received his first training in the handling of snakes and mounting of birds and animals from the late Dr. C. Grimshawe, pioneer physician of the upper county section. As a young man, Mr. Miller was caretaker on the Backens estate at Cold Mountain, and lived there until a few years ago when the property was sold.

Mr. and Mrs. Miller own their own farm where they raise vegetables, apples, corn, chickens and cattle. Until a little more than a year ago Mr. Miller was able to do a full day's work, but a severe illness left him unable to do manual labor and he now devotes his full time to taxidermy, and has a wide collection of small animals, birds and his snakes.

Negro Wife Slayer Captured by Local Officers In Brevard

Because he "figgered you'd get me anyway," Jim Smith, Greenville, S. C., negro, stayed around Brevard, and Deputy Sheriffs Buck McCall and Lewis Osborne placed the negro in jail Friday night.

The Smith negro was wanted in Greenville for slaying his wife with a razor so badly that she died last week. The Greenville police came up to Brevard last week to look for the razor-wielding negro but he ran off and left them when he overheard the South Carolina cops asking about his whereabouts, and he managed to elude local officers until Friday night.

Smith was sitting in a Brevard colored man's residence enjoying the radio program when officers walked in on him, and because he "figgered you'd get me anyway," he made no attempt to run. He was carried back to Greenville Saturday, and will be tried there for murder.

Boxing Bouts Friday Interesting Affair

Fast and furious, faint and fuddled, was the fighting at the Playhouse Friday night in five mixed bouts.

Matthew Allen, black Brevard boy was stopped in the fourth by Smith, also of Brevard; and two more of the Smith boys paved around for a few rounds to open the show.

Feature bout failed to last out the first round, as McNeely of Lake Toxaway literally pummeled the breath out of Barber of Brevard College. This started off as a whizz, but the collegian couldn't hold his pace, and the bout was over with the fast stepping Toxaway boy still king of all comers so far.

Coot Moore and Boyd Meixell went three rounds to a draw, and showed they could each take and give. L. C. Wilson of Selma outpointed Campbell of Brevard College in three rounds. Both boys gave and took some stiff jolts.
