SCOTLAND COUNTY SAVINGS BANK

A Slacker County

Any person that does not do his full duty to help win the war is looked upon as a slacker. And any county which fails to do its full duty—fails to reach a reasonable set goal—is a Slacker County.

Scotland county has not yet reached its quota in War Savings. Unless it does—then what do you suppose our boys over there will think.

The boys who have gone from this county to the firing line, are watching us.

BOYS OF 30TH DID THE "IMPOSSIBLE."

Broke Line the Huns Claimed Could Not Be Broken.

Goldsboro, Nov. 3.—"It was great and we are tired, but happy. We broke the line that all Germans claimed could not be broken, and the men from North Carolina, South Carolina and Tennessee did it with such dash and determination that a Boche prisoner told me that if all American fighters were like these that the Germans could not hold up longer. As a matter of fact, they are not holding up anywhere, but he did not know it," declares Lieut. Thomas Daniel in a letter written to his parents in this city, in which he gives a vivid description of the recent great drive and the part taken in it by Goldsboro soldiers in France.

"At 5:50 a. m., Sept. 29, our artillery put down a creeping barrage," says Lieutenant Daniel's letter. "We had assembled quite a big number of guns for this work, and it was some artillery show. To begin with, in the dawn of the early morning light, and exactly zero hour, the men went over the top in perfect waves and held close to the creeping barrage. Soon the barrage lifted and we carried the first line trenches with a rush. Soon the second enemy line and then the third. The men in the first waves fought down to the village of B—and soon cleared it up. An hour later, by dash we were astraddle the Hindenburg defense system, an hour later a second village was taken by our men, and late in the afternoon we reached our objective, a depth of 2 1/2-3 miles.

"This fight will go down in history and will can the people of the three states remember and honor their sons and brothers who fought and gloriously died on this field of battle. Never had I dreamed of such bravery—the place was alive with machine guns—thousands of them. Many of the men were cut off from their officers but this did not stop them, for they only knew one thing, to kill Huns, and kill Huns they did. They rushed machine gun nest after machine gun nest, taking them all, leaving nothing behind but dead Huns and battered guns.

"Capt. Zeno Hollowell, from home, and his company were shut off and for three hours were subject to a rain of machine gun bullets. When one of his men grunted and rolled over, two of his comrades sprang up, caught him around the shoulders, and walked off to the aid station with him indifferent to the regular hail of bullets. They went through without a scratch. Captain Hollowell's gas mask and glasses were pierced by bullets but he was only slightly wounded.

"One man captured 96 prisoners by himself. Others rushed and captured machine guns by themselves. It was a stiff, hard fight for all and it was well fought. We just received warm congratulations from our division commander, General Lewis.

"We are back now for a rest and it's rather like what Mark Twain said about pulling a tight fitting shoe off a sore foot. Australian and English officers of much experience, who passed over the field after the fight, said that it looked impossible. This natural terrain, rolling wooded hills, a vast net of wire and perfect trench systems, with 30 and 40 foot dug-outs, inspired Jerry, so he thought, a line that would never be broken. And he did he think when he provoked the United States into the war that the Yanks would be the ones to break it. Young Roland Cox and Marion Daniel were killed in this fight. They died bravely leading their men on. Sam Hummel was killed later in the day valiantly fighting in the stiffest part of the line. I was talking to officers Cox and Hummel just before zero hour. They were happy and jovial and looking forward to the fight with much anticipation. There were other casualties in Goldsboro boys but I haven't yet been able to ascertain who.

"One of the cold-blooded things I observed during the battle was that while hundreds of Boche prisoners were passing down in groups, the Hun did not cease his artillery fire in that direction on account of this and I saw hundreds of his own men killed by his own artillery fire. On this road I also saw four Boche prisoners bringing in an American wounded on a stretcher. A German shell fell right in between them, killing all four Germans, but by a miracle the American escaped injury.

"The most remarkable thing was the wounded. I saw men with legs and arms off laughing and smoking, and not the least sign of pain on their faces. One 16-year-old lad from Fayetteville, who smuggled into our outfit, had a leg carried away. He was laughing when they brought him in, and he said, 'a cigarette and a drink of water is all I want.' I was talking to the surgeon the day after the fight. He told me that he had never seen men with such grit—that there was not a groan from a single man. He stated also that one man was brought in with his arm and shoulder shot away. He said, 'Doctor, tell me frankly, have I got a chance?' The doctor answered that he had a fighting chance. The man said, 'Oh! a fighting chance, I'll get well then.'

"Some of the poor Huns still believe that the Kaiser and God meet in secret places as did Moses on the mountain. Prisoners say that letters from home state that things there are very unsettled. Some of the Huns fought well in this battle and held out to the last, especially the machine gunners; others yelled 'Kamerad' pretty quick. It was real funny to see them peeping out of a dug-out that had been bombed, yelling 'Kamerad' like a bunch of swine and trembling with fear.

"Taps is now blowing, the sweetest of all bugle calls, and again I think of the 'last taps' for the boys who so gloriously died for our noble cause;

brave, valiant lads, they knew no fear and fell with their guns in their hands facing the enemy. They died happy. Name "Honor Roll" for the First Ten
