HOMESICK

Maggie was very fond of her uncle. He told such splendid stories, he always talked entertainingly. He never talked to her as though he were only giving part of his attention to her as so many people did. He was always ready to treat her to an icecream soda. Altogether he was almost a great man. His house was full of treasures which had been er countries. An Ice-Cream Soda. He had traveled all over the world. He could tell you how the people lived and dressed and acted in all parts of the world.

But best of all was his library. It was only a little room but all around the room, save where the door and window were situated, there were books which went down to the ground and right up to the celling.

He had a little ladder which he climbed up when he wanted to reach the books high up.

Down low there were huge books with many pictures in them. And how he would talk about his books. He would climb up the ladder and pull down a book. Then he'd tell Maggie what the book was about-perhaps why the man had written the book-he made a book come alive at once.

And then he would read to her in his low, expressive voice, and it seemed as though the book-shelves no longer surrounded them but as though they went on many voyages and adventures right there in that library.

That was why Maggie loved the library above all rooms.

It wasn't just a room. It was like the opening archway to many lands. In this room you met quantities of people-fascinating, interesting, adventurous people who lived only part of the time in the book pages.

When you wanted them to do so they came forth and told you all about themselves. Then they were real. Oh, they were so tremendously real

Now and again they would read poetle secrets to the stones over which they passed.

Maggie loved to tell of the time the mouse had run into her room and right across the end of her bed and she had not been afraid in the least.

The big rain that struck the Eastern part of the county last Friday didn't reach us but we had a good purchased, for taxes, at the Sheriff season Saturday night. Mr. Overstreet the County Agent was over to see us last Tuesday. Mr. Dixon and wife and E. S.
