SHIPWRECKED
Coastguardsmen featuring in the rescue stated by telephone when called by the Beaufort News that although a southeaster was blowing, it was not blowing with much velocity at the time of the wreck. It is believed that the man on watch thinking he had already passed the Outer Diamond of Diamond Shoals was making a shoreward tack and was in the breakers at Ocracoke before he even knew he was off his course. Rain storms during Friday night probably prevented the man on watch from seeing the blinking warnings of Ocracoke and Cape Hatteras lights. Coastguardsmen patrolling the beach sighted the distress flares shortly after midnight and answered with their Coston signals. Lifesaving equipment from both stations on the island was towed to the beach by caterpillar tractors (which replaced draft horses in stations along the coast a few years ago) and in preference to launching boats the line-throwing cannon was set up and a line was shot out to the vessel. The breeches buoy, a method which coastguardsmen are expertly trained in the use of, was the practical way to bring the survivors ashore.

Capt. Clausen reported to coastguardsmen that the estimated value of the vessel was $5,000—but gave no estimate on the value of 338,000 feet of pine lumber aboard. The craft is beyond saving but had not started breaking up when the Beaufort News goes to press. Quite a bit of cargo was washing overboard and ashore and littering the beach. What may have been an unlucky break for the owners of the vessel was a lucky one for residents of Ocracoke. A wrecked ship means much driftwood that can be converted into fuel for stoves during the bleak winter seasons of the outer coast. Much of the lumber too will be washed ashore and salvaged by the islanders, same to be used in constructing new homes or for general building.

The last wreck of any consequence on Ocracoke island was the George

W. Truitt which foundered on the beach during a March gale in 1927. She was a four-master loaded with lumber. Charles Canfield of Morehead City was in charge of salvaging much of the lumber from that wreck which was purchased at the auction by a Morehead City firm. A year or two before another four-master, the Victoria S. loaded with lumber, wrecked on the beach at Ocracoke. On Hatteras island the two most recent sailing vessel wrecks were the Geo. H. Kohler near Kinnekeet and the Levinia Snow near Creeds Hill.
