The present Young Turk Cabinet will have a much better chance of continued power after the war if it fights to the last ditch for a city held in such esteem.

There is little or no prospect that the Turkish forces behind the fortifications at Tchatalja will be able to afford Adrianopie any relief. During the late armistice neither side was supposed to alter its position, but of course each side was industriously engaged in this very act. Nobody doubts that the Bulgarians, now heavily reinforced by Servian troops have forfitified every eminence between the beleaguered city and the Tchatalja lines. They are likely to attact Adriunder the necessity of keeping prepaired against attact father south and east, where the forts' on the Galliopia peninsula defending the Dardanelles are now menaced by perhaps 70,000 Bulgarins and the Greek fleet. If their troops here are beaten, they will be taken in the rear and Constantinople's plight, with the sea-way cleared, will be desperate indeed. At present, therefore, all Turkey's available troops are pent up in the narrow penisula between Tchatalja and Constantinople, awaiting assault from the southeast, if not quite yet from the north. The territory thus held is all that remains to Turkey of an empire which four centuries ago covered in Europe, about 500,000 square miles. In 1800 European Turkey had shrunk to perhaps 300,000 spuare miles Three-quarters of a century later it had shrunk by more than half from these proportions; and since then two of the allied Nations now assailing their old masters have arisen in her receding steps. Her easy victory over Greece in 1897 only served to lay the foundation for the quintuple alliance which has cut down her European dominons from their last previous mark to the 2,000 square miles now dis-
