OCAL BOARD INSTRUCTED the famed Lost Battalion of the Ar-

MARRIAGE WILL

NOT KEEP YOUNG

This was made clear by General Van B. Metts, state director of ective service, as he announced a the former policy of iency toward married men which been recommended by state headarters. General Metts stated that nodification in this policy was made essary by an increasingly large mber of registrants who are ap rently undertaking to abuse the licy of leniency in an effort to ade military service. The modified policy, which was ssed on to all selective service agens in the state today, is as follows: When a registrant acquires marshould be assumed that both pars concluded the marriage knowing t the registrant was subject to rly call for service and were pre-red to take the consequences, and erefore deferment in such cases uld not appear to be justified. But en a registrant has indicated on questionaire that he is engaged ing the date set for the wedding has given similar information in iting to the local board and the ding date falls after issuance of tice to appear for physical exami tion, his case should be considered the same way as those who mard after registration, as provided by endment 77 to selective service rulations.

"Of course, there may be other aditions which would obviously nper the above announced modifion of policy, e. g., proof that the fe was pregnant, or conclusive eviice of absolute dependence wherein wife would suffer undue hardship compelled to live on the regisnt's income as a soldier, etc.

This modified policy, General Metts inted out, is in line with a recent endment to the regulations, which as follows:

'It is not advisable to defer any h registrant if he acquired such atus for the purpose of evading ining and service, and, therefore, registrant should be placed in ass III if he acquired such status ter the day when he was required be registered unless (1) he or claimed dependent or dependents sent to the local board writter atements of the facts peculiarly hin their knowledge, showing the story leading up to and the cirmstances under which such status s acquired, and (2) such facts show

Famous among the birds used by the Americans were Cher Ami, "President Wilson," Spike, Mocker and Big Com.. Cher Ami was the savior of gonne. Isolated from the rest of the Seventy-seventh Division, this battalion sent bird after bird into the air only to see each brought down by German sharp-shooters and machinegunners. Cher Ami, the last bird left although wounded in the breast and ninus a leg, finally got through to Division Headquarters with a message which gave the exact location of the lost men and led to their rescue.

Mocker for his valiant service. In Times of Peace

Feathered messengers were used by man for peaceful purposes long before they were put to military use. The ancient people of the Orient and Egypt made use of them. The Greeks, who borrowed the idea from the Persians, used pigeons to report the result of the Olympic games. Ancreon in 560 B. C. wrote on "Ode to the Carrier Pigeon," telling how each province's representatives took pigeons to the games and sent word back home how the games were progressing. Homing pigeons' speeds average from 30 to 60 miles an hour, although a record of 75 miles and hour has been made. The birds can stay in the air from sunrise to sunset and have hung up some remarkable long-distance flying records. One bird released in Havana, Cuba, on July 4, 1930, arrived in Baltimore, Md., five days later, 1, 300 miles away.

Back in his office John Barton wondered why the girl at the end of the row had raised half-frightened eyes as he had entered their room.

It might be worth trying. At five minutes of nine, just before "early retiring" bell rang and the teachers sought their rooms, a meager-looking little man in slouch hat and a fierce black mustache, sneaked into Miss Minifer's room and hastily dived under the bed. Instantly a big hand clutched him, and a horrible, husky voice growled, 'Not a yip, or you're a dead one!"

The whoop of utter surprise and horror that had actually started fr the intruder's interior uttered itself as a sort of quack, which couldn't have been heard on the landing. A bulky ruffian, smelling fearfully of tohacco, and with a black handkerstarted, he began to find fault with his face, was clutching him, and he

"Who says we don't?" "I never saw such a bunch of skinny girls in all my life. They look half-fed!" "That's the way they want to look," rasped the partner, who was pater to a near-skeleton daughter.

"Somebody ought to take them to lunch occasionally and give them a good feed, or they'll fall dead on our hands if they get much worse."

"Why don't you take turns asking them? You're a bachelor. I can't!"

"Tommy," said John Barton next day, "whom do you consider the prettiest typist we have here." 'Why,'' said Tommy without hesitation. "Barbara Beirne, No. 6, with the pinkest cheeks," he added dreamily.

John Barton contrived to dictate some letters to Barbara when his own typist was late, and shortly after asked her to take dinner with him at the Sea Pavilion.

As they sat on the lovely pavilion overlooking the sea, eating delicious food and listening to entrancing music, John Barton decided that Tommy Norton's taste was unquestionably good. He appreciatively observed Barbara's pink cheeks grow pinker as the cool air from the water blew upon them. It was with surprise that John Barton realized he was beginning to look forward with considerable pleasure to his occasional meetings. with Barbara Beirne, and it gave him no little amusement to notice a growing reluctance on Barbara's part to accept his attentions. Obviously she hesitated because she must feel the difference in their social status, he thought, and she showed her good sense in doing so. Many a girl would have openly encouraged him. He appreciated her modesty. He began to dream of the time he would finally propose to her.

Wouldn't she be surprised! And then one night it rained. It came down in torrents just as he was about to enter his roadster on his way home for the day, and he jumped back to the office for his raincoat. When he entered he heard voices in the typists' room, and the loudest one was Tommy Norton's, which didn't belong there; and the other. Beirne, and she was talking.

"But Tommy, you were always saying how nice he was, and how much you liked him, and I wanted him to like me, too. I only wanted him to like me well enough to make him wish to give you Carr's place when he resigned, and when he o get a steady position before geting married.'

visible. She laid hold of the edge of the spread and bent to look under the bed. The ruffiian's hand dug into "Boots'" quivering flesh. She felt the menace of the revolver. Then, with a scream of warning like the cry of a lost soul, she fainted completely away!

"You are a very foolish little girl," said Miss Minifer, somewhat later, to a revived and chastened "Boots." "Your father has no objection to your going on the stage when the right time comes, but he wants you to lay the foundation of some education and an understanding of what obedience and discipline mean, first.
