A shirt waist, as such, is decidedly Fortunately the demand for this style

The crepe or silk bodice that is provided with the plain tailor costume for early spring should be built on the simplest lines. The two-year-old design, with the entire waist laid in either half-inch tucks or else narrow box-pleats, with a detachable collar of net or Irish lace that can be easily washed, cannot be improved upon. The model is made up-to-date by mandarin sleeves, while the popular ruche of the material down the front of the waist laid a little to one side is still a favorite finish. The waist fastens in front with either buttons or hooks and eyes hidden beneath the ruffle. The collar is best lined with 'net which washes more satisfactory than chiffon. White cuffs improve the waist, but it is well to so finish the sleeves at the wrists that cuffs shall not always be necessary.

Messaline satin of any practical color, made in a surplice design, the material bordered with two or three rows of gold-colored soutache and the V at the throat filled in with a lace yoke, makes an extremely smart and also a most serviceable waist.

The first figure shows just such a bodice as this. It was made of coral messaline and worn with a skirt of London-smoke broadcloth. There was a trimming of black braid outlining the surplice and this outline and the cuffs were edged with a frill of lace edging. The skirt showed the new hip or yoke trimming. It was a circular model and, as every woman knows it is impossible to make a skirt circular narrow without many darts. Yoke skirts have become quite a fad. These yokes are always trimmed with flat or fancy braid and in some instances with hand embroidery.
