

Chemistry --- The Idiot's Delight

Talking about chemistry, (which we weren't; but I have to start this story some way.) The Friday lab class is all an idiot in his right mind could dream for. Take for instance last Friday . . . everyone was busy blowing glass bubbles and stopping up Bunsen burners with chewing gum when Al Huddleston, in the process of heating his glass tube to a glowing red, suddenly discovered that some ignorant tool was not heating his right. So . . . Al, always being the helpful soul, crammed his tubing in his back pocket and proceeds to elucidate.

Marshall Shankin and W. G. Hunnings, the first to smell the smoke, looked around and saw Huddleston's (ahem) pants ablaze.

(May we say here that Huddleston would make a fine general. He burns his bridges behind him.) Being heroically inclined, they grabbed a bottle of water and heaved it with such force that Al, thinking the water main had burst, backed right smack into the midst of Buck Johnson's experiment and plowed through a bottle of copper sulfate. Just about this time, Buck Sanders rounded the corner and saw Huddleston's green face peering above the edge of the desk. Thinking he had swallowed some acid, he recalled his boy scout first aid, promptly poured three bottles of tincture of green soap down his throat, and slugged him in the stomach.

Well, Huddleston's hair stood straight up, his eyes turned a beautiful chartreuse, and he shuddered three or four times. Then it was all over . . . the place!

(That was the first time I had ever seen a full course dinner with nuts.)

"Who in the 'ram flazzled pot lotted whazz lop' did this to me," he bubbled as he reached for his handkerchief. Finding no handkerchief in his back pocket which wasn't there, he grabbed a towel and stomped out of the room. Proving that if you try to help someone in chemistry, you might end up with the raw end of the deal. (No pun intended.)
