She'll Open Her Mouth And Ruin Whole Thing

By CORNY STILWELL

Girls may be the "romantic" sex, but they're not deferred from "opening mouth, inserting foot, and biting off romance at the ankle." If we are lucky enough to have our night of fairytale romance, likely as not we'll open our mouth once too often and ruin the whole thing.

There lies the horrible motivating force that leads to our own destruction. For instance, the girl who's always talking (and I've really got room to criticize) usually finds plenty of times when she wishes she'd never learned her ABC's. It's almost an established fact — as nearly every male knows — that women can't keep a secret. I mean, if you've got something you want everyone on campus to know in about 30 minutes, just tell the girl next to you in the library and when you leave the place — everyone will know.

When we ought to be quiet, you can wager money that we won't. The girl who tells everyone three weeks before a dance that she'd wish a certain someone would ask her out, will be the same girl who's not escorted to the dance by that certain someone. And too, if you'll notice the next time you're in a movie which guys are slouched way down low in their seats, you can almost bet that their dates are the "Hi, Mary, Jane, Sal" type. There isn't a soul who comes into the movie to whom she doesn't speak. Notice, too, how many of the "Mary, Jane, Sal" sheepishly wave and immediately launch a campaign of monopolizing their escort's attention?

And speaking of monopolizing someone's attention, ever notice the girl who's draped over some chair talking to a fellow who's draped over the next chair — and he's wishing he were about three chairs over too! This type is the one that has false eyelashes that are a little heavy — notice how long she blinks. That's because she's having a bit of a time opening her eyes with all that extra weight!

And look at her hair. Now you can hardly tell whether it's real or not — but please don't test it out. Last week a friend of mine mortally wounded three fellows who swore up and down that they just knew she was wearing a wig! (She was. Funny thing was — she's naturally bald!)

Can you imagine the enormous bill this girl has for cosmetics? She uses 3 tubes of lipstick each week (every-time she sneezes into a tissue she wastes $.25 on lipstick that she wipes off).

Then comes the fun part — the powder and all that makeup. (For those of you who are unmarried, sisterless males — there's pressed makeup, a base makeup, a cover-up makeup, and the top-soil makeup). Of course, you need about 2 small shovels per week ... that's to scrape all this off once it's on.

But back to the girl who's draped over this chair talking with the boy 3 chairs over ... oh, no, he's wishing that he were. Well anyway, guess what they're discussing? Baseball.

He says to her that he's got an extra ticket to the ballgame and can she go. To which she replies that she'd love to since she adores baseball. He can't believe this dame goes for sports but he's really delighted that she does. Will it be a gala evening? I doubt it. On the way to the ballpark she asked him, "Who's quarterbacking?"

Of course, there are times when opening one's mouth can cause things to backfire on the speaker. Don't ever tell your campus hero you'll type a term paper for him — especially if you can't type! You may get a date with him for it but you'll be so exhausted from staying up all night hunting for that sneaky little ole number "1" on the typewriter that you won't enjoy your date.

Yes, if you're a female there's no doubt that you've suffered some attack of "shut my big mouth-itis." I personally can think of many times ever yhour that I have had an attack. I keep telling myself to try and forget what I've said and to be sure that next time I start to speak I remember that if I keep my mouth closed people can't guess just how dumb I am.

Library Adds Over Two Hundred Books

A significant addition has been made to the Atkins Library with the acquisition of all except fifteen volumes of the 263 volume set, General Catalog of Printed Books. The books were acquired shortly after Easter holidays.

This set is a comprehensive listing of the books, periodicals, and other material available in the British Museum, the national library of Great Britain, as of January 1, 1956. The remaining fifteen volumes will be shipped to the library as soon as they are published later this year.

The General Catalogue is principally an author catalog, with title entries or cross references for anonymous works and a limited number of subject entries. Full imprint information is given for most titles. The acquisition of this set means that the Atkins Library now own two of the major bibliographical tools used by librarians and researchers throughout the world. The other tool owned by the library is the National Union Catalog, a complete listing of resources in the Library of Congress, the U.S. national library.
