Q: A year ago I gave up taking birth control pills. Now I am back on them again with no adverse affects. The problem is this: One of my friends told me that the pill can only be taken for a total of five years. Is this true or not?
A: Is there anything else I can use beside the pill which would be just as effective? I have never tried anything else. I don't know if this is worth mentioning, but I only see my boyfriend about every three weeks as he goes to a different school.
A: There is no evidence suggesting that the pill should be taken for a specified total number of years; women have used them for a considerable length of time with no signs of adverse effects. The normal pattern of usage of the pill appears to be one in which it is not taken continually, as had been your experience. The decision to become pregnant, a change in sexual activity, or other events usually interrupt the use of this contraceptive. Of the very large number of women who participated in the original field trials of oral contraceptives in the late 1950's, a bare handful are still taking the pill.
 The crux of the issue appears to be whether the use of the pill is indicated when a person is sexually active as infrequently as you describe. Many physicians, this one included, would suggest that alternate forms of contraception be explored in situations where intercourse occurs infrequently. For instance, your boyfriend can use a condom and you can use a contraceptive foam such as Delfen. This combination is extremely effective, has no side effects, and is inexpensive. As well, these materials are available in any drug store without a doctor's prescription.
 Another possibility is the use of the diaphragm. This method is also highly effective when used as directed. An examination by a physician is necessary to obtain a prescription for a diaphragm. Does your college health service offer contraceptive services? Try them if they do, or try Planned Parenthood or a private doctor if they do not.

Q: I was employed by the city forestry department on crews which removed trees which had fallen victim to Dutch Elm disease. Now, many weeks after I quit, small tufts of my hair are yellowing and falling, and small sections of skin on my palms are flaking off. Is it possible that there is any connection between the tree disease and my problem?
A: There are no reported cases of Dutch Elm disease being transmitted to human beings. From what you describe, it is unlikely that you are the first one. Coming so long after exposure, the symptoms are probably not related to the trees in any way.
 There are a variety of allergies that can cause skin conditions after contact with trees and plants but these appear rather rapidly. Fungal infections can cause patches of hair to fall out although the yellowing you describe is a little mysterious. Fungal infections can also cause flaking of skin. The only wise move at this point is to be examined by a dermatologist to determine what you have.

Q: My husband's penis has developed a skin irritation in the last couple of months. It is reddened and sore and every few days pieces of dry, flakey skin can be peeled off. First aid cream does not help much and I wonder what could cause this condition?
A: Do not panic; I have read of only one or two cases of a penis falling off. More than likely, a fungal infection or other type of skin disorder is present. I would advise against using first aid cream, but rather have your husband check with his regular physician or contact a dermatologist. Warm weather or too many clothes in cold weather can produce heavy perspiration which creates a fine environment for a variety of skin difficulties.
