In A Bookstore.

He wasn't dressed quite as fashion dictates, yet he somehow inspired the confidence of the bookstore clerk as he lazied up to him, evidently thinking of a purchaser.

"Little chilly here," he said.
"Chilly, how?" perspiringly replied the clerk.

"I mean it's an ice-store."

"Oh, I see, you're a humorist. One would hardly think it to look at you."

"Indeed? You ought to know my brother, the doctor; he'd kill you dead—which way are your books bound?"

"We have them in various bindings. Can I show you something?"

"Possibly; I'm really in your line myself."

"Indeed?"

"Yes; I'm bookkeeper—is your ink well?"

"Oh, quit it, will you? I'm not hired to kid with you."

"Your boss ought to discharge that girl over there; she's awful."

"Awful—What do you mean?"

"A moment ago I saw a penholder—how long does your paper weight?"

"I wish you'd get out of here."

"I shouldn't think your boss would let you leave your head-gear lying around that way."

"What way?"

"What is that behind you?"

"Fool's cap."

"Oh!—can you change a $20 bill for me?"

"Yes, I think so."

"Thank you; when I get one I'll come in and let you change it. Hot, isn't it?" Do you know I run in debt for my underclothing, but I suppose you have cash drawers?"

"I wish you'd get out of here."

"Yes, I must go—do you keep ledgers?"

"Certainly."

"They're a good thing to keep, that eraser in the showcase seems to be enjoying our conversation. What's it made of?"

Rubber."

"Have you got Kipling's books?"

"Yes, sure."

"Why don't you return them? Well, I must go; got a cigarette?"

"No, I haven't."

"Well, never mind—that girl looks weary; I just saw her letter-head drop. Good-bye."—Chicago Journal.
