Paper Made from Peat.

We've several times read articles fraught with the fear that at the present rate of consumption of timber for paper making as well as the various uses, the time might not be far off when paper would advance in price. From an article by Paul Hassack in the Scientific American it seems that problem, too, is solved for a few more centuries.

An Austrian named Zschornner, who has large interests in peat deposits, observed the fibre in the peat and conceived the idea of utilizing it. His experiments led to complete success, for he finds he can make all kinds of paper, card-board, etc., from certain grades of deposits, owing to the nature of the grasses and mosses that have been submerged in the bog that formed it. The chemical process by which the dark mud is separated, leaving the pure fibre is not very elaborate and the pulp is obtained much more cheaply than the wood pulp. The bleaching, too, is not difficult.

The process is patented in the United States, Canada, British Columbia, Japan and all Europe.

The immense beds of peat all over the world will now become sources of great profit.

There are deposits not suited to paper making, but they can be utilized as now for fuel, for which it is pressed into small bricks and dried when it is a competitor of coal.

The Eternal Grumblers.
What is success to brag about?
Some men make wealth 'tis true,
And envy others, who, no doubt,
Will envy these men too.
Some men go childless to the grave—
Perhaps 'tis for their sins—
While others curse their fate and rave
Because they're blessed with twins.
—Pick-Me-Up.
