How to Preserve Wives.
This special sort of preserve might prove to be an invaluable household article, did the many conscientious and well meaning men who believe in the propriety of preserving their wives understand the culinary art required for their best preservation. The following method, if carefully adhered to, never fails to give satisfactory results:

In the first place, wives are a fruit which should be selected for quality, more with regard to their flavor than their appearance, which will result in the agreeable surprise of tasting better than they look. They should never be placed in an earthen agate ware pot of any old dimension or shape, but into a generous loving cup having a true heart shape. Cover with water judiciously flavored with pure grape sugar to keep them sweet and palatable.

That they may be kept thoroughly warmed, place the receptacle on the back of the stove in which must be used for heating purposes the free burning coal, never gas! Do not make the mistake of submitting the fruit to a varied temperature, as it is apt to impair its flavor and extract an uncertain bitterness. It may be necessary to stir it occasionally, but this should be done with a heart-shaped spoon.

Throw into the loving cup now and again a handful of herbs, sweet violets and fragrant magnoneite. You will be surprised at their preserving quality, and the deliciousness of the aroma which will permeate the atmosphere will prove most appetizing. A few gold coins dropped gently at the right time into the water and allowed to simmer during the process of preservation will tinge the mixture to the king's taste.—New York Sun.

A Remarkable Speed.
The passenger train which were the prominent officials of the Southern over the new road from Columbia to Savannah, has a record left behind it. At one time during their trip the indicator showed that they were moving at the rate of seventy-four miles per hour.

This was a fine trip for the officials and newspaper men and a great advertisement for the line but we are reliably informed that the new train ended one white man's life as it passed through Barnwell county.
