FRENCH FARMERS CHANGING

Some Farming Facts and Figures.

FRANCE is figuring in the news in many ways these days. First we hear that its wine merchants are happy over the big business that they are doing with the U. S. A. Then we hear that Frenchmen are complaining that there will be few American tourists this summer because the franc has risen from around 4c to almost 7c.

If your geography is rusty, you may like to be reminded that France has 212,659 square miles, or 53,237 less than Texas. Its African colonies, however, are about 20 times as big as France itself. There are 5,500,000 farm owners in France, with the average farm consisting of 24 acres.

ement, knowing the importance of nitrate of soda in war, put a restriction upon imports to build up a synthetic nitrate industry in France. The French farmers, tradition-bound, refused at first to believe that the synthetic nitrate of soda gave as good results as the product which they had been using.

Forty per cent of rural France is farmed. Over 12,000,000 acres are in wheat, 8,500,000 in oats, 3,800,000 in vineyards and 3,500,000 in potatoes. Textiles, iron and steel are the big French industries. The population of greater Paris is over 3,000,000.
