The World's Best Laboratory By Rufus T. Strohm Dean, International Correspondence Schools

SCHOOLS and colleges spend millions of dollars on laboratories. Students pay hundreds of thousands every year in laboratory fees. Yet men and women who have never gone to college study every day in a laboratory that no college in the country can match—and get paid for doing it.

Every experienced teacher will tell you that the only knowledge a pupil thoroughly absorbs and retains is material which he has put to use. That is the reason for drills and exercises and tests in the classroom. It is the reason why "learning by doing" has become a watchword of modern education even in the elementary grades. And it is the reason why thousands of spare-time students write me that they learn easiest when what they grasp under the study lamp tonight helps them solve problems on the job tomorrow.

In your own job you have the world's best laboratory—but only if you make it so. If you merely "hold down a job," you get nothing out of it but a pay check, and you won't get even that when hard times come or when the progress of industry leaves your job behind. But if by spare-time study you make use of this laboratory that is now at your disposal, then your job becomes a career.

When peace comes, war industry will be changed to new kinds of production and new industries will be born and thousands of men with newly acquired technical training, released from service or from war production, will be seeking places for themselves. Those who had the best places, those most needed, will be those who have learned how to learn on the job. The world's best laboratory? Answer using 25.
