(An Editorial)

Dewey's Influence For Good?

Whatever crooked things Dewey's political foes may charge him with, they cannot say he has no redeeming traits.

In his speeches he may have used his prosecuting attorney's art in juggling facts, and filching paragraphs from contexts, leaving the true meaning twisted—

He may have deliberately falsified in his charges against the Administration's neglect of the country before war came—

He may have plain lied about Roosevelt's trying to keep the boys in the service after the war because "it would be cheaper than finding them jobs"—

He may have grossly stultified himself in trying to shield the record of his party when it voted against lend lease, against enlarging the army, against fortifying Guam, against building 100,000 planes a year, against increasing the navy, etc.—

He may be guilty of all this, but his detractors cannot claim that his influence has not been against one of the greatest evils of the nation, one of its most alarming vices—

And we mean the national vice of gambling.

In every campaign many thousands of dollars are wagered and won or lost in the great game of gambling on the election.

But the news comes in that this national vice in the present campaign is almost nil—the people have stopped this presidential candidate gambling.

We must with great reluctance admit that the Fourth Term gamblers are still reprobate and unconverted, have not let up in their efforts to get bets, but they have met with but little success. Although they have offered 2 to 1, 3 to 1, 3 1-2 to 1, and as high as five to one, no Dewey money appears to meet these bets, and the gambling precincts in Wall Street, Philadelphia, Chicago, Los Angeles, etc., are as dull as pig tracks.

There is no Dewey money stirring—so the 4th Term gamblers say.

Whether we shall attribute this moral change to the spiritual influence of the Republican candidate for President, who has been a crime-buster in his native State with great unction from somewhere—we don't know where—the facts are plain and understandable to all men—

There is no Dewey money.

Maybe the explanation may be found in the admission of a gambler at St. Louis who has in every campaign been very active in the betting game and who is strong for Dewey—who said: "The truth of the matter is that we haven't anything to bet on."
