Fundamental Unity

(From Science Magazine)

The greatest contribution of biology to intellectual emancipation has been the doctrine of evolution, that great theory which has revolutionized all our thinking regarding man and nature, writes Prof. E. G. Conklin. And evolution is the distinctive contribution of biology to civilization, for it was in the living world and especially in the human realm that the doctrine of evolution came as the great emancipator from superstition and ignorance. The greatest theme of evolution is not the origin of species, not even the origin of living things, but rather the oneness of all life.

This is indeed the greatest principle of biology, namely, that through all the endless diversity of the living world there runs this fundamental similarity and unity. We also are living things and all that concerns other forms of life is of direct interest to us. In the lower organisms we see ourselves in simpler and more primitive form; we see man from the standpoint of the whole living, world as superior beings in another planet might look upon us, and as a result we have ceased to a large extent to regard the universe as existing merely for us. In this intellectual revolution we have ceased to occupy a position of solitary grandeur in a little human universe, we have not grown less, but nature has become so much greater than man's relative position in nature has changed.

No backward glance shall hinder or appall me;
A new life is begun,
And better hope and better motives call me
Than those the past has won.
Lillian Knapp.

Why, Certainly

"Why do you put your dolls away so carefully?" asked Aunt Myra.
"Oh," replied little Eva, "I'm keeping them for my children to play with."
"But suppose you do not have any children?" queried her aunt.
"Then," replied the little miss, "I'll give them to my grandchildren."
