A Friend Of The Children Gone

The little white woolly dog of the French poodle species, belonging to the children of Mr. Walter Crawford on Fourth Street, has gone to his reward. "As we live, so shall we die" is aptly illustrated in his passing, always puffed up with pride over his life's work in guarding and protecting the kiddies, he continually made his influence felt among the passing dogs, both high and low, great and small, in his section of the town. Many a time has he dashed into the street and, with rasping growl and snapping bite, put to ignominious flight a great hulking hound. Many a time he has retreated sorely surprised and hurt, but still ready if occasion demanded to make as much "fuss and fury" as ever in the discharge of his noble duty as the guardian of the children.

In keeping the human species at a respectful distance from the children, he resorted to quieter methods. Often a stranger intruding upon them first learned of "Poodle's" presence by the feel of a tug at the bottom of his trousers, or the sharp pain of his teeth on his leg.

He looked upon all children as his charges, but the little Crawfords were his charges day and night. He understood this as perfectly as a human being, and nothing would induce him to desert his post or slacken his vigil except the suggestion that he needed a bath. At the word "bath" he would forget all duty and shamefully lurk in hiding the rest of the day.

There was also a bit of vindictiveness in his nature, and this proved his undoing. The special objects of this weakness were the small dogs of Mr. J. H. Lasley and Mr. S. G. Morgan. He never could get the Lasley dog, because he was always in the Lasley yard; and many a time he exhausted himself chasing his enemy up and down the lawn fence, thinking he was filling him with complete fright.

The Morgan dog had frequently attacked passing the street, but he had never been licked by his enemy, nor had he ever administered the licking that had lurked in his system Saturday last furnished him his opportunity, but, as often happens in the life of men, in his zeal to be at his antagonist he failed to take into consideration the wheel of Mr. Morgan's automobile.

He lies at rest, buried in the corner of the Crawford garden, his grave covered with flowers put there by those little fellows whom he spent his life trying in his way to serve.

Benefited by Chamberlain's Liniment
