Shade for Late Hatched Chicks

Late hatched chicks often fail to make satisfactory growth because proper shade is not within their range, states Mr. A. G. Oliver, Poultry Club Agent, Agricultural Extension Service. Folks who are careful to give an abundance of green, succulent foods often fail to realize the benefits from the protection of growing vegetation. Chicks that are obliged to retire to the closeness of a hot coop, or house, in the heat of summer, because there is no other shelter from the sun's rays are not getting the best possible conditions.

The air under the shade trees, or in the shelter of a hill of corn is fresher and cooler than that of the coop; the soil far less likely to be infested with mites; while within reach there may be sprouted weed seeds and insect life.

Shade for late hatched chicks is more needed than for those that were produced in the cooler weeks of spring.

Somewhere there are fruit trees, berry bushes, asparagus plants, wild growth, that can be utilized, while such crops as corn and velvet beans can be quickly and easily grown.

There is no objection to growing good chicks and good corn on the same lot of land, each crop helping the success of the other.

Chicks that suffer from the unprotected sun of summer do not make good gain from the food given them, and the owner is wasting part of the high cost feed that he has to purchase. Help save needed feeds by giving better summer conditions to your chicks.

American Aviator Shoots Down an Enemy Biplane.

With the American Army in France June 2.—During a fight Sunday afternoon between four American planes and six German planes, north of Toul one of the American pilots shot down an enemy biplane.

Almost at the same time, however, one of the American machines apparently was hit by an incendiary bullet and burst into flames from 45 to 100 meters inside the enemy lines.

After further fighting of short duration the American and German machines separated. There was little other aerial activity today.

"I dreamed of hebben last night," said one colored epicurpan to another.

"An' what wuz it like?" asked the other with much interest.

"It wuz er great big chicken roost stuck up in de middle ob er water-melon patch," was the reply.

BRAZIL IN THE WAR.

The news brought north by Sir John Aird, of the Canadian Bank of Commerce, of Toronto, who recently returned from a visit to Rio de Janeiro, concerning the attitude of Brazil toward the war, confirms previous advices in that particular. A majority of the Brazilians, he says, restless because of the inactive part their country is taking in the conflict, are clamoring for an opportunity to assist the Entente Allies by force of arms.

Popular sympathy in Brazil has gone out from the very beginning of the war, to the nations engaged in the work of stemming German aggression. In Brazil as in other South American countries, although perhaps perhaps in less degree, the national Government failed to keep pace with public sentiment in this respect. Were it not for conservatism in high places, Brazil would have broken with Germany in advance of the United States. When the Congress of the southern Republic, on October 26, 1917, declared a state of war with Germany, existing, the vote in the Chamber of Deputies stood 149 to 1, a showing which sufficiently indicates the state of public opinion in the Republic at the time.

But it cannot be said that, in the nearly seven months which have elapsed since Brazil's declaration, no progress has been made in the direction desired by the majority of its people. As a matter of fact, a great deal has been accomplished. The Republic had to meet, in some of its states, conditions even more difficult of handling than those which confronted the United States. Germany had set to work deliberately to colonize a great section of the country, with a view to its complete domination at an early day. It is the conviction of many students of the situation that, had not the German forces been hurled back at the Marne, an armed rising of German military colonists would have taken in Southern Brazil. Upon the discovery of the conspiracy, Brazil set to work, with even more vigor than did the United States, to destroy the alien enemy influence. There is scarcely a vestige of it remaining today. The four maritime states which harbored great numbers of people of German birth and descent, previous to October 1917, and which Berlin hoped might become a German possession almost overnight, are now apparently freed from menace of conspiracy and sedition.

To have accomplished this means a great deal more than a simple statement of the fact can convey. But Brazil did not stop here. The Republic immediately set to work to raise its army to a modern war footing. When conscription was proposed in the Chamber of Deputies, it was assumed in some quarters that Brazil's desire to obtain a powerful military force without delay had its root in the fear of internal troubles. It soon became evident, however, that Brazil was already equipped sufficiently to deal an effectual blow to the pro-German element, if it should exhibit any sign of resistance. The pro-German element realized this, and gave evidence of possession of the knowledge by indulging in an exodus to Argentina, Peru, Uruguay, and other of the South American republics in which the anti-German sentiment had not become quite so intense and threatening.

Meanwhile, laws were enacted annulling contracts for public works entered into with Germans, prohibiting new land concessions to German subjects taking over of German bank control; prohibiting transfer of ownership of German property, and internment of thousands of suspected German subjects. Meanwhile, also, preparations for a more active participation in the war have gone on. Brazil is engaged in enlisting, drilling and thoroughly organizing a large army. It has built up an aviation war corps, and has sent detachments to London. It has been acquiring shipping, and is doing everything possible toward the upbuilding of a navy and a transport service. If it had transports at its disposal today it would be shipping troops to the front. The country is at war, realizes this fact, but nevertheless, is discontented with the part it is playing. Perhaps it would not be going too far to say that popular opinion in Brazil is very much of a kind with popular opinion of the United States, so far as the war is concerned, at the present time. While much is being accomplished, the people feel that a great deal more could be done. Realizing the almost boundless resources within reach, like the people of the United States, the Brazilians are losing patience with everything that makes for delay.

In general terms it may be said that like the United States, Brazil is finding itself and getting its pace. It is equally certain in both cases that popular restlessness will exist and continue to express itself in both countries until instead of skirmishing on the edge of the war, each shall have plunged into its depths with all the energy and power at its command.—Exchange.
