"Colonel" Drake's Oil Well

Interesting Sketches In Oil No. 6

EDWIN L. DRAKE, in 1856, was forced to resign as conductor on the New York & New Haven Railroad because of ill health. Eagerly accepting an opportunity to work in the open, he took his family to Titusville, Pa., in 1857, with orders to bore an artesian well for Oil. The president of his company began writing to him as "Col." Drake to increase the latter's importance in Titusville, and the name clung to him. Drake started happily, but as time went by and his funds grew lower drilling became increasingly difficult. Finally, Saturday afternoon August 28th, 1859, the well had been drilled to a depth of 69 feet, and the workmen "laid off" till Monday. Sunday afternoon Uncle Billy Smith, one of Drake's companions, visited the well, and to his amazement he found Oil rising in it. Next day the well began pumping 20 barrels a day, and the news flew around the world. The first well bored intentionally for Oil had been a success!

From that hole in the ground has grown a mighty industry—the Oil Trade. Oil has been perfected and adapted in a thousand different ways, but in no way are its blessings more apparent than in The Red C Oil and The White C Oil, same except in color, the truly fine Kerosene for your Lamps, Stoves and Incubators.

REAL STORY OF FINAL BREACH BETWEEN LODGE AND WILSON

"Postscript" to Second Note on Lusitania Figured. President Made Denial

Washington, Nov. 10.—When the time shall write in final estimate of Henry Cabot Lodge, it must turn for its most colorful passages to the story of that strange twist of circumstances which set his name over against the name of Woodrow Wilson in one of the stirring periods of American history.

Both outstanding men of letters, called by some the two greatest American examples of the scholar in politics, the venerable senate leader and the war time President found themselves in disagreement, determined and irreconcilable at the very time of their most virile public services. Each in his proud and resolute way sought at first to ignore the impassable barrier that was rearing itself between them; but in the end each came to acknowledge it openly, though each sought to blame the other.

Differences Over League

The most fundamental differences between them was over the league of nations. For his opposition to unreserved acceptance of the Versailles covenant, Senator Lodge was assailed by his enemies with a bitterness equalled only by the fury with which the enemies of the league attacked Mr. Wilson; while by his own friends and followers the Massachusetts senator was eulogized and revered as the American savior of liberty who had fought courageously against a subtle invasion of the independence of his country and had preserved for posterity the cherished traditions of the fathers.

It may be that history never will know the full story of that epochal struggle, which lifted both Lodge and Wilson to new heights of leadership. As each had been a dominating figure in the making of history, so each had hoped to become at last the historian of his times; but, worn by the rigor of battle, both have fallen into their last sleep without completing the work that circumstance and natural inclination seemed to have patterned for them. When Mr. Wilson died, he left only scraps and patches of the great human chronicle he had hoped to set down for future generations. A few weeks ago Mr. Lodge confided to his friends that he was gathering material for a story of the league fight in the senate and for other histories of the great days of his intimate association with men and affairs. The task never was finished.

During the earlier years of the first Wilson administration, the relations between Mr. Wilson and Mr. Lodge were without feature. They met on occasion, but not often, and talked of public affairs as any President and any senator of an opposing party might. They never were friends. It was not in the nature of impossibility where he thought it might not be welcomed, or to override by sheer will that indefinable feeling of restraint which now and again springs unbidden between two strong individuals. But even as they eyed one another at a distance, Lodge cast his lot with Elihu Root in support of the Panama canal tolls repeal advocated by the democratic President and Wilson thanked him.

The actual breach in their relationship was reached late in 1916. Many stories of how it came about have been whispered about Washington, but here follows the actual sequence of events during that period of rapid and final transition.

On the night of October 26, 1916 in a campaign speech at Brockton, Mass., Senator Lodge declared without qualification that President Wilson had added a "postscript" to the second Lusitania note to Germany, assuring the imperial government that some of the previous vigorous American pronouncements on the subject were "not to be taken seriously." The charge was denied by some of Mr. Wilson's friends, but it was repeated by Senator Lodge at Ogdensburg, N. Y., on October 29. Then, on the following day, Mr. Wilson issued a formal statement saying the assertion of Senator Lodge was "untrue."

Beneath the terse phrases of the Presidents denial, there was apparent to those who knew him a portentous depth of feeling. Senator Lodge replied in terms quite as direct, saying he would not question the word of the President of the United States and must accept the denial; but he recalled that the authority on which he made his original statement had appeared to him unimpeachable. To his dying day, the senator believed he had been fooled by a clever use of language, and that some sort of supplement to the Lusitania note, if not precisely a "postscript," had existed.

This incident left no pretense of personal cordiality between them. During the following month Mr. Wilson was invited to attend an annual versary ceremony at the historic "Church of the Presidents" and White House officials announced that he had accepted. Later it became known that Senator Lodge also had been invited. Wilson did not go, and after he had refused the invitation Lodge accepted.

The trying months of the war saw no change in their personal relations although on many occasions they submerged personal considerations to support measures and policies that both believed for the good of their country. It is a part of history now, later on, each set his face resolutely along a different pathway in the League of Nations fight and how all the efforts of their best friends failed to discover any common ground on which both were willing to stand. They exchanged words for the last time on March 4, 1921, when Wilson went to the capital for the Harding inauguration ceremonies. Lodge, in his role as leader of the majority, entered the President's room to go unsmilingly through the formality of announcing that the old Congress was ready to adjourn unless the chief executive had some further communication to make to it. At first apparently oblivious to the presence of the senate leader, Mr. Wilson turned to him after a tense pause and said in a tone whose sharpness never will be forgotten by those who heard:

"I have no further communication to make. I appreciate your courtesy. Good morning."

Two years later, when death laid its hand on Wilson, Lodge rose in his place in the senate, according to custom that goes with leadership there, and pronounced a brief eulogy to the intellectual attainments of the departed war President. Unknown to him or to members of the Wilson family, he was named on a committee to represent the senate at the funeral but a formal statement from his office announced that a slight illness would prevent his attendance. And thus was written the final chapter of the earthly relationship between two proud and militant Americans.

Davis Plans to Return to Practice of Law

New York, Nov. 6.—John W. Davis, defeated democratic nominee for President will return to the practice of law in New York after a holiday to be spent on a cruise in the Mediterranean, it was announced today by his secretary. Mr. Davis will leave within a few days to visit his former home, Clarksburg, W. Va. Upon his nomination for President Mr. Davis resigned from the law firm of Stetson, Jennings, Russell & Davis which he joined in 1921 on finishing his services as a minister to Great Britain. At the same time he gave up directorships in several corporations.

Bad Coughs Ended Quickly by Double-Action Remedy

Remarkable results in quickly clearing up the severest coughs have been obtained with a prescription by a well-known specialist that does two things at once. It not only soothes and heals the soreness and irritation, but it very quickly loosens and removes the phlegm and congestion which are the real cause of the coughing. It is often astonishing how speedily the cough stops. The prescription is known as Dr. King's New Discovery for Coughs. It is particularly valuable for night coughing. To promptly end this annoying and weakening cough, simply before retiring take one teaspoonful of Dr. King's New Discovery and hold it in your throat 15 or 20 seconds before swallowing. People who have been unable to rest on account of continual coughing have often gotten their full 8 or 9 hours sleep by this simple method. Dr. King's is excellent, too, for children's spasmodic croup, bronchitis, laryngitis, bronchial asthma and hoarseness. On sale at all good druggists. Ask for
