Game of Footprints.

The merriest kind of a game can be played with the aid of several old newspapers and a little lampblack or soot. The papers are laid carefully over the carpet so as to completely cover it, and the lampblack spread out a little on a thicker paper at the corner from which those who are to leave the footprints start.

Something is put at the opposite side of the room as a goal. Then some one has his or her eyes bandaged, and is told to make a bee line for the goal. Before bandaging the eyes, however, the player is to step into the lampblack, so that each step shall leave its mark.

There is a prize for the one who makes the straightest line of steps. The fun lies in the waving line of prints. The soberest matron or the keenest witted young man leave a disreputably uncertain trace behind, so that under other circumstances it might lead people to think they had looked upon the wine when it was red, etc.

Another amusing blindfold game is of French origin, and is a pretty one, suitable for an Easter party. Across the room at one end are strung two fine wires, and each of these has a lot of pretty little gifts of small value hung to it by narrow ribbons which are about 10 inches long. The lines are about a foot from the wall.

The players are drawn into two lines. At the opposite end of the room, and blindfolded, two by two, the two first on the lines are given a pair of sharp scissors each. At the word "Go" they start toward the lines. The two first ones reach out with the scissors and try to cut a ribbon.

Not once in a hundred times do they reach one. Each has three trials if he or she misses the first. When these have tried and failed, or won, they remove the bandages from their eyes and retire, holding their gifts—if they have them. They give the scissors to the next two, and they try, and so on. Each one is blindfolded as his or her turn in the line comes, and makes the trial.

When the whole company has tried, the hostess will see that any one who missed getting a gift receives one of those not secured, for there are, or should be, one for everybody. It is surprising how little real idea we have of distances without sight.

A large face made on pasteboard and painted has a mouth large enough for anybody to pass the hand through. This will be fastened to the back of two chairs. Behind the mouth a bag is hung, and this, too, has a lot of trifling gifts, some pretty and some comical in it. The company present, one by one, are blindfolded and bidden to reach down the ogre's mouth for his or her good fortune.

It is worse than a donkey party as far as accuracy is concerned, but eventually every one gets his or her gift, even if they peep under the bandage a little. The opening and comparing of them is a fund of amusement.—Philadelphia Press.

Little Girl: "Your papa has only got one leg, hasn't he?" Veteran's Little Girl: "Yes." Little Girl: "Where's his other one?" Veteran's Little Girl: "Hush, dear: it's in heaven."—Boston Courier.
