IN THE DECEMBER HEAVENS

Four Planets Visible in the Sky
During This Month.Venus is the Evening Star and is Continually Growing Brighter—Interesting Data.

HERE are four planets which may be seen in the evening sky during December. First towards the southwest, is the brilliant evening star, Venus, which each night mounts perceptibly higher and higher among the stars, and grows continually brighter, until by the end of this year it is the second brightest object in the heavens. Then, a little to the east of Venus, in the eastern part of the constellation Capricorn, is the planet Saturn, which is still in good position planet Saturn. At this instant the two planets will be exactly one above the other, with Venus four-fifth of a degree to the south.

On December 20, in the early evening, the moon will pass over the bright star Aldebaran. Its eastern edge will reach the star and shut it from view at 8 hours 25 minutes eastern time, and the emergence will occur at 9 hours 46 minutes. The observer will notice that while the light of Mars will fade gradually away as the moon passes over it, the light of Aldebaran will be blotted out instantaneously. This is because Mars appears to us a round disc, while every star appears as but a single point of light. The instant the edge of the moon reaches this point of light the star simply goes out, with a suddenness far more rapid than that of a flash of lightning. Were there the slightest trace of air or water vapor on the moon, the light of the star would be extinguished more gradually. It is observing occultation of stars in this way that astronomers have learned that the moon is a dead world without either air or water.
