IN THE WORLD OF BOOKS

New Books at the Library.

Since the opening of the Library there has been anxious inquiry as to the coming of new books. Up to this date all that could be said was that they were "on the way," like Gilpin's hat and wig. But now; they are here! Here with their fresh new covers and inviting illustrations!

Do you wish to read for yourself and decide whether "The House of Mirth" deserves either the praise or the censure attached to it? You will find it in red and gold ready for you unless some speedier visitor has seized upon it. Do you wish to be warmed by "The Divine Fire" and fanned by "The Breath of the Gods"? Would you cross the Alps when "The Princess Passes" or travel in an automobile with "My Friend the Chauffeur"? Does not "Barbara" tempt you with her dainty sandwiches served "At the Sign of the Fox"? Can you cast up "The Reckoning" with Robert Chambers, or do you prefer to visit "Starvecrow Farm" with Stanley Weyman? Perhaps you may choose to enter "The Garden of Allah," or to sail "Under Rocking Skies." If none of these move you, you may become "A Wanderer in Holland," or a pilgrim "Among French Inns." When weary with your journeying, you may devote yourself to Van Dyke's "Essays in Application" or laugh over "The Pardoner's Wallet."

The children will be glad to enlarge their acquaintance with Sara Crewe in "A Little Princess," and their eyes will shine as they look at "The Red Book of Romance," and "Days of Chivalry." These are not half the good things in store for those who visit the Library!

A Daughter of the South.

It seems a pity that in "A Daughter of the South," by George Cary Eggleston, (Lothrop, Lee Shepard Co.,) the author has failed to carry out the promise which "A Carolina Cavalier" gave. There is no reason why "A Daughter of the South" should not have been a fine story. The plot is not hackneyed. The author's style and diction are for the most part good. The hero,—presumably we must call the "leading gentleman" the hero, though in most books he is far from heroic—is of a somewhat unusual type. But the character drawing is far below the author's standard. Two deeply dyed villains are brought out for our inspection. One gives promise of real life, and his threats, muttered in conversation with himself, give promise of dead loads of trouble for the aforesaid hero; but he is forgotten somewhere in the tale, and never reappears, nor does his threatened trouble materialize.

The other villain is a beautiful animal, some six feet or more in height, with handsome features and a frame which is
