

we went out and shot so many lions that the blood rock was not red but yellow, and I heard the whistle of the train blowing and so we went away.

A little bird sat on a tree
And chirped a song to me;
But a wicked hunter came along
And quickly ended Birdie's song.

A little boy held up his hand,
Because he could not understand;
The teacher made him learn the rule
And sat him then upon a stool.

ELDERLY GENTLEMAN: "Say, did you see a hat that blew off that car?"

POLICEMAN: "Yes, I just threw it back on the car."

ELDERLY GENTLEMAN: "Great Scott! I just jumped off after it."

THE ANDOVER VERSUS EXETER TRACK MEET.

It was the thirty-first of May, a bright sunny day, and it seemed nice to look out of doors and think that school for me was done with, and all the hours of that spring day were free for me to use as I pleased.

But this was the day of the Andover Academy versus Exeter Academy Track meet, a thing we, (my sister and I) had talked over ever since we had reached Andover.

Mother bought the tickets and at a little past two we started.

We were late, and when we got there, the high hurdlers were nearing the finish line. We stood and watched them before we went to our seats, and saw an Exeter lad cross the finish line first, and fall panting into a student's arms, amid the cheers of Exeter.

We hurried to our seats and by the time we got comfortably settled another feature of the day had taken place. Then we looked at the score board, it stood Exeter 27, Andover 13.

It was a pretty sight that met our eyes as we turned to look at our surroundings. The sky overhead, blue and cloudless, save for a few white fleecy flecks that floated here and there, the grass green and verdant all around us, the youths in their running suits, with their A's and E's on them, the cheering sections full of eager, excited lads, the mothers and sisters, the cousins and aunts, clothed in their best, raising their parasols and peering anxiously at the finish line to see if the youths who broke the tape wore Exeter's crimson or Andover's blue, and last but not least, the autos decked in red and blue.

AN ODE.

Oh! how the boarders yell
Somewhere about twelve.
That's when they yell,
When they hear the dinner bell.
Oh! how the ladies cry
When they see the birdies fly
In the bright blue summer sky,
For it makes their hats come high.
Oh! how the parrots swear
When the people visit them there.
Oh! how the boarders swear
When the peacocks come near there.

THE CASTAWAY.

(Concluded)

(Adapted from the French of Maurice Leblanc by P. L. Lightbourn.)

The day passed. All night the women stayed there shivering on their knees. It was no longer possible to believe that the boat could have survived the storm, but hope dies hard. The night passed.

When the gloomy dawn appeared, the weary watchers saw something tossing on the sea, which by now was somewhat calmer. It was the raft, yes, the raft, and on it the castaway was waving his arms frantically as before.

Nearer and nearer it approached. A wave stronger than the rest, cast it up on the beach.

It's occupant leaped ashore. It was—a baboon! A huge creature which frisked about and gambolled joyfully, until one of the women, mad with horror, struck it on the head with a large pebble and killed it instantly.
